
Hoping soon to receive more favorable news, I remain, my Lord, with sentiments of profound esteem your Grace's servant in Christ,

Secretary of State.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS:

Heartless, Headless, Godless.

SOME VERY STERLING TRUTHS WORTH STUDYING.

Three Fatal Defects in Public Education.

Rev. P. P. McSweeny has an article on Public School Education in the January Catholic World from which we make the following forcible extracts.

This, then, I submit, "is the writing that is written," Heartless, Headless, Godless. "And this is the interpretation of the word" "Heartless."

Your public school system is one which ignores "the heart" and has the effect of drying up, or at least parching and stunting, the science on which the dews and rains of heavenly religion do not fall. It consequently is not calculated to bring forth Christian men and women who will believe in God and His commandments, and in future rewards and punishments, and who will value right and honesty above temporal advantages, and who will be spiritual by strong enough to conquer their animal passions. Man has affections as well as intelligence, and he is to be educated it does not do to train his head only. Inside the family one father would be guilty of bringing up his boy in this way. He would expose his child to much bad treatment from his parents, to make him tender and pure, than he is to provide him with a rock or cradle by which to rock his child. Catholics believe that this branch of education is much more difficult to impart illegitimate requiring less time than the other, it needs more, and as they think it ought not to be relegated to the Sunday or to the home—especially at those hours in no home worthy of the name but should have its place daily, and therefore, they ask it added. It cannot be taught by memory lessons merely, or by books merely, but by every word that proceeds from the parent and teacher. Like the salt which seasons our food, it may not be taken in doses once a week, but every night, lest man be in the food at every meal. It must be in history, in geography, in reading lessons, in the manners and character of the teacher, aye, in his very eyes.

The child learns as much, perhaps more, from the teacher by salt than by learning. Now, in your common schools the Catholic child has a teacher who may be a scoffing infidel, or at least may have no belief in the doctrines of his Church; and even in some opposite doctrines are taught openly, or by the many secret ways which are heterogenical and shut off by no inspectors, since to do so it would be necessary to annihilate all character in the teacher, even then there is a cold negative and neutral tone in the most approved of all branches of education, which must produce on the child a piety and faith a blighting influence, and, as we see now in the men and women who are graduates of this system, the effect is agnosticism or indifferentism to all religious belief, which is hailed as a noble charity and broad brotherly love by those who do not understand it rightly. Let those who are now Christians, whether Catholics or Protestants, and who shall believe and practice as their parents did before them, look back for a moment to their youth, and they will perceive that it was not the teaching of their parents, but the spirit that kept them in their Church was not the formal lesson, but the tone of the conversation of apparent nothings in which they lived in an atmosphere of faith, and breathed in the atmosphere of prayer or reverence, the little events of every day family life, which were great ones to their young minds, and gradually and imperceptibly made them what they are to-day. We hear much about the Church to be, here and in another in Monday! Who would be willing to put a child, whom he loves, to place to place, now to a warm patch and then to a cold one, now in the sun and then in the shade? Who would have his child in an atmosphere of faith, and then, for six days or parts of days in the week to keep of the rain and dew? The result of his child would not be healthy, but would be dwarfed and sickly one, if not a mere dry stick. So education, I repeat, is life. Himself, the child advances in wisdom, age, and grace. The age depends on years and days and weeks, and so its wisdom. Education is what helps and aids in this growth. Where a halting plan is in use the child has no example at home which Catholic, and another at school which is Protestant or agnostic. It looks up to the teacher as to God and love her, and it also looks up to the mother and loves her too. Will it not take the side in the neutral or cold ground of indifference and doubt? Catholics say it will, and so they are not satisfied with the public school system. They want unity and sympathy between the two authority—the teacher and the natural mother.

We have no objection to make to the individual teachers, many of whom are good Catholics, who would be glad to teach their religion, but are forbidden, under pain of the law. Neither do we care so much about the fact of the system as regards active branches, although, in the opinion of most people, there have been, and are, cases of practical common sense displayed, at least in some places, in giving at the public expense a training which will put it the children of the toilers at natural labor for their respective occupations. This probably is what was meant by Mathew in the writing of the Sermon on the Mount, where he says that commissioners of education are misleadership, they are so beautiful in their dress. Possibly it has occurred sometimes that a poor child was picked up and given opportunities which developed in him such spirit and genius, that he ended by becoming President or something like it. But in more than ninety-nine cases in hundred, we shall have reason to regret if the son turn out as well as his father. We say let the expense which is to teach only the common branches—reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, and history, leaving out the languages and Logics. If it happens that a poor man should have a son of extraordinary ability, in most cases he will himself be able to push him forward, or, if not, the philanthropists who are willing to do it are as numerous as such children, and the worst that will happen is the loss of an ornamental given man, which we can better afford than all this expensive machinery of education.

The system is also heartless from the very fact of its being heartless, and so, since it forbids any religious teaching, it must be Godless. We would be far from saying that communication between children is worthy of such a title, but if the last, through extremely favorable circumstances as advice and example, continue to fear and hope in and love God, they have not the school to thank for it. They will not, generally speaking, be good Catholics, and if they are good Protestants—which we do not deny—they cannot be expected to behave it satisfactorily to God.

Hence the system, not applying itself to Christians, might to be changed, or its days are numbered.

Moses, Moses, Moses is also written on the wall by the hand of God.

Mene Mene has been numbered thy days and finished thy work.

Thekel—"Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting."

Phares—Thange will never work well till the system is divided and divorced to suit different interests, and made broader, so that it may be adapted to each sect. A way may be found where there is a will.

Let us make the public schools more secular.

ST. IGNATIUS SUNDAY SCHOOL.

Christmas-Tree Festival of the Female Department.

Under the auspices of St. Aloysius Circle the annual Christmas Tree Festival of the girl pupils of St. Ignatius Sunday School, took place in the College Hall, last Sunday afternoon. A large audience was present. At the left side of the stage a gigantic Christmas Tree was placed and the Hall was decorated with a variety of evergreens. The exercises opened with a capital song slowly rendered by the Sunday School Choir, Miss Lizzie Sparks, delivering a dignified address of Welcome. A beautiful duet of the Infants was given with considerable realism. Misses Emperia Gonzales, Teresa Kelly and Mary Burke then recited the "Messages of Faith, Hope, and Love to the Shepherds of Bethlehem," a clever composition from the pen of Miss Harriet M. Wild. Miss The Shepherd's Thanksgiving Song," was sung clearly and was succeeded by a tableau of "Heartless." Then the Infants sang in sweetly blended voices the "Child of Bethlehem." Miss Mary Cronin, who had a very pleasing manner, then delivered the closing address. The distribution of extra prizes and Christmas gifts was the last act in the members of the Sunday school—probably the most interesting of all the programme. The exercises passed off very nicely and were highly enjoyed by the immense audience. Miss M. Hagerty had charge of the Christmas Tree, the decorations were in the excellent management of Miss Shilmore, and Miss K. M. Ryan, the Superintendent, established the music. Miss Mary Hagerty presided with much ease and grace at the Organ. Miss Lizzie Sparks, who also had charge of the Warbling music pleasant and perfect as it was possible to be.

The Female Department is under the charge of teachers and also the classes in the girl pupils are taught by the Sisters of Mercy, who, by such non-let regular attendance, good deport and good lessons, are to be commended.

JESUS, MARY, JOSEPH.

A Name when breath of earth is the silent air,
With golden light surrounds!
It wings its way direct to heaven fair,
With love intense around it.
A Name when with sincerity allied,
Dispels dark Satan's gloom;
Then in our hearts, forever will abide,
Sweet Victor's endless bloom.
But when 'tis spoken with irreverence dread,
Cuts, like a spear, the soul;
Our blighted hearts are then like with Satan wed
In bitter anguish dole.
That holy name is Jesus—magic word,
With love the soul it assists.

In age-land, t'we now with love 'tis heard,
Great interest by the saints.
To it who dwell in constant bliss above,
In worship bend the knee;
Nay, in the gloom of hell, that Name of love
Sounds sterndly.
With reckless unalloyed to service free,
Full men in reverence bend—
In pure unstained bliss or burning tears—
To Jesus—Mankind's Friend.

Ah! with what depth of tender love we speak
Our Mighty-holy name,
Whose Holiness heart, for man—her children
bent,
With love is all aflame.
Thy name! It is a magic fountain bright
Of grace divine and true,
It assumes hearts that grope in sin's dark night,
As flowers are slanted with dew.
We linger fondly on thy name, Mark,
Repeat it o'er and o'er;
Oh! stretch with gifts our pathways' dreary way,
Like sand on ocean's shore.

We hail thee, foster-father of our God—
St. Joseph, ever mild,
Whose every thought while this bleak world lay Bind,
Was fixed on Mary's Child!
Who dilled—while joy—across our Mother's heart,
Raising this world of strife,
Believing ever wounds of sorrow's dart
Which pierced her tender life.
We linger fondly on thy name, Mark,
Repeat it o'er and o'er;
Oh! stretch with gifts our pathways' dreary way,
Like sand on ocean's shore.

We praise thee, Holy Family, we praise—
Type of the Trinity;
Oh! fanne our hearts with Victor's warming
rays,
To love fadingly.

ONLY A WORD.

Only a bench and an angry word
Hastily uttered and painfully heard,
Leaving the father and standing smart
Deep in a tender and loving heart.

Only a glance and a scornful frown,
Flooding the cheek when a thinking person—
Gloomily nurtured till souls and heart
Slowly but surely drifted apart.

Slowly but surely drift away,
Treading the path of an unknown day,
Bitterly feeling the blinding rain—
Life can never be the same again.

Only a word! but the tenuine heart
Quivering turns beath the fiery dart;
Only a frown! and a world of pain
Circles a heart with its calling chain.

Powerful Titans whose baleful art
Blanketh the banks of Love apart,
Stealthily toiling 'till day by day,
Hearts that once loved have drifted away.

Drifted away—in the world of pain
Blossoms of Love shall not bloom again;
Drifted away and the weary years
Are drowned in a passion of remorseful tears.

OR! SOFTLY TOLLED THE ANGELUS BELL

Oh! softly tolls this Angelus bell
Among the Evening's shades,
And sounds along the purple hills
And down the silent glades.

O, Mary Mother, hear our prayers
Amid the twilight's charm,
And warm our barren hearts with love—
Save us from sin and harm.

And in the West the setting sun,
His golden light delays,
And tints the balmy, cool grey clouds
In lovely Beauty's mass.

O, Mary Mother, hear our prayers, etc.

Again a bell is sweetly heard,
And all the sophyr's mild
Suspend their sigh and fragrant wings,
And listen like a child.

O Mary Mother, etc.

Again that dear and magic bell
Doth thrill our souls with bliss,
And falls on cold and stony hearts
Like manna from above.

O Mary Mother, hear, etc.

THE TWO CROWN.

Deep was the bank so, rapt in fervent prayer,
Knell Catherine—Siena's fairest flower!
Nor yet alone, for angel's hovered there,
To share her solitude in that still bower!
To whisper solace to her aching heart,
And in her depths a heavenly peace distill.
In vain both every cost in vanished dark,
All her, where soul divinest grace doth fill.

Dependent Heaven! Empire yet around,
Whence comfort, light, and strength, and refreshed light
That fill her chamber? Whence those tones that sound
With thrilling sweetness in her day tonight?
And are her spirit-friend and soothe grief
Behold the Harbour holding in her view
A golden Crown, whose jewels be displays,
And let a crown of woven thorns, too.

"Beloved daughter!" Tenderly he spoke,
With ravished eye His loving spouse had heard
That voice, which in her hearing oft awoke
Emotions sweet as such endearing tones
"Thou prayest in rare succession most blest,
Thou dry drink pressing on the cup,
That as My sufferings thou mayst share,
And then receive the jewels for thy brow.

"Or, should thee wish thine glittering pane to
No load be thy wreaths even for My sake,
Hereafter thou shalt be golden Crown shall lose,
And wear the heavy and piercing thorns take.
Oh! ever cast thy eyes upon the Crowns pere
Upon our rugged way!
Oh! teach us to be patient and endure
The trials of Life's short day.

We praise thee, Holy Family, we praise—
Type of the Trinity;
Oh! fanne our hearts with Victor's warming
rays,
To love fadingly.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

—The value of real estate in New York may be appreciated from the fact that the building operations for last year, in the city, foot up $38,000,000, as against $19,000,000 for the same time last year, and $36,000,000 for the same time in 1885.

—It was a queer coincidence that the venerable Dr. John Ogden, of New York, should have died on the night before Christmas. He was twice married, both his wives being the daughters of Clement C. Moore, the author of the poem "The Night Before Christmas."

—We see by the daily papers that the twenty-fifth Mass by Harper a few years ago employed to draw disgusting caricatures of the Pope, the Prelates, the priests and the Irish people, is about to lecture in this city. Self-respect may be preserved by all Catholics and Irish-Americans who studiously avoid attending those lectures.

—On the third page of the present issue we print a very interesting condensed biography of St. Peter Claver, one of the Jesuit Saints canonized recently by the Vicar of Christ. It will be concluded next week. We will also print for the edification of all Catholics a brief sketch of the life and labors of Blessed Louis Grignon de Montfort, of the Order of St. Dominic, who was Beatified by the Holy Father last Sunday.

—February 1st, the feast of St. Bridget, has been selected as the day upon which the corner-stone of St. Patrick's Church will be laid in Rome by Most Rev. William J. Walsh, Archbishop of Dublin. Archbishop Ryan of Philadelphia will preach the sermon, and the same day the Irish pilgrims will be received in special audience by the Pope. Many visitors are expected from Ireland and other countries, and the ceremony will be a memorable event in the history of the Eternal City.

—Mr. Arthur O'Connor, M. P., who arrived at Gloucester last week, was welcomed by a great crowd and escorted to his hotel. In an interview he said that the reception accorded Sir Thomas Grattan Esmonde and himself throughout the United States had exceeded their most sanguine hopes. He said that the feeling among Americans, from the President downward, was in favor of Home Rule for Ireland, and that the people were shocked at the manner in which the Tories were enforcing the Coercion law.

—The Presbyterian preachers recently assembled at St. Johns, New Brunswick, proved to be strict from the Confession of Faith, by a vote of 9 to 4, the clause forbidding a man to marry his deceased wife's sister. It is not improbable that the agitation that this special legislation was brought about by the fact that some of the goodly-good parsons of Presbyterianism had "a widow" in his mind's eye! Ah! those preachers! they are the unholiest set of humbugs in the whole wicked world!

—The Pope in his Encyclical just issued to the Bavarian Bishops says "secular schools are a menace to the State itself." President Cleveland uttered the same sentiment when he said to the members of the Evangelical Alliance which met recently in Washington "all must admit that the acceptance of the teachings of Christianity resulted in the purest patriotism." Or, in other words, that citizens educated without Christianity were not as good as those imbued with Christian principles—from which true patriotism always springs.

—Mr. Creamer, the defaulting ex-Mayor of Hackettstown, N. J., it is discovered, was engaged to marry three women in his borough and twelve others elsewhere. A Schooley's Mountain woman says he had been engaged to marry her for fifteen years. Mr. Creamer was thrifty and turned his engagements into financial profit, but it must have kept him busy trying to remember the names and residences of the numerous maids and widows he promised to marry. And then to think of the deceitful rascal keeping up a marriage engagement for sixteen years and finally leaving the lady in the lurch! A jury of women would hang, draw and quarter such a scalawag!

—A great effort is just now being made to place Catholic parochial schools under the jurisdiction of the State. A telegram from Boston says that a great sensation has been created there by the report of a special committee of the Legislature which recommends that private schools be required to register and return lists of pupils; that the School Committee be required to visit and examine private schools and to report annually approving or refusing to approve of such schools; that after September 1, 1889, no such private schools be approved unless taught by teachers holding certificates of qualification from the School Committee, as is required in the public schools. These recommendations will, if adopted, place all the parochial schools under charge of a school committee of almost certain Protestant complexion. This system of espionage—or education is, however, too utterly opposed to the spirit of the Constitution ever to be adopted, hence the cranks who concocted the scheme, will find it only another still-born freak of intolerance and fanaticism which has few followers in free America.

Look Out for Flim!

We learn from the Nevada City Transcript that a disorderly individual representing himself as a Catholic priest, recently imposed upon the charitable Catholics of both Nevada City and Grass Valley, and as he is an itinerant tramp who loves whiskey not wisely but too well, we are asked to caution the Rev. Clergy and Catholics all over this coast to repel the advances of a sleek-tongued stranger who hoes for such only to disgrace the clerical calling to which he pretends to belong.

Beatification of the English Martyrs.

The highest honors bestowed upon the servants of God by the authority of Christ are those of Canonization—for which the process of Beatification is a necessary condition and a remote preparation. To many the one fact only, the stages of the whole process coming in the consistories are chiefly there. First thousands of Holy Men are Venerable, that is worthy of the love and veneration of the Faithful, as his virtues, heroic virtues, are proved to have shone out in a worthy manner in the Human Court, and been deemed worthy of being introduced and made the subject of the Church's investigation. Such title has been lately conferred by the Holy See on 261 English Martyrs, including 25 members of the Society of Jesus, 128 secular priests, and also the revered martyr Oliver Plunkett, Archbishop of Armagh. The next step is when the Venerables are declared Blessed which constitutes the process of their Beatification. By the decree of the Congregation of Rites, issued December 29th, 1886, and signed by his Holiness Pope Leo XIII., 54 English Martyrs have been beatified, including Cardinal John Fisher, Thomas More Chancellor of England, Margaret Pole the Countess of Salisbury, 20 secular priests, 18 Carthusians, 3 other Religious, 5 Jesuit priests and 5 laymen, among whom is Thomas Sherwood, a boy only fourteen years of age.

The final stage is when the Blessed is declared to be a Saint—this is called his canonization in virtue of which his or her name is entered in the roll of the Saints, and proposed to the veneration of the Universal Church. This highest honor has been lately conferred by his Holiness Pope Leo XIII. among others, on three members of the Society of Jesus, Blessed Peter Claver, Blessed John Berchmans, and Blessed Alfonso Rodriguez, whom we now venerate as Saints, and the Feast of whose Canonization already celebrated in Rome, will be commemorated with appropriate solemnity in St. Ignatius Church of this city sometime during the present year, to be duly announced in the Mission.

As Cardinal Manning well says that the sentence of the Church does not make the servant of God to be Blessed a saint, nor does it, as objectors foolishly suppose, transfer him to heaven and place him before the throne of God, but it only declares him to be what God has already made him and publishes it to the faithful, just as she does not create a new dogma by her definitions, but she declares that such or such doctrine is contained in the deposit of revealed truth and should be believed by all. The Church is profoundly conscious that without holiness no man shall see the Lord, and hence she pronounces those only to be Blessed or to be Saints, in whom she found evident signs of eminent grace and sanctity of life. She requires, therefore, a protracted and exact proof of the virtues—cardinal and theological—in a heroic degree, and well as validated miracles as the countersigns of the Divine favor, and of their utmost power before she throws of God. But on the process of a Martyr for his beatification, proof is required either of virtue or of martyrdom. All that is necessary is to show an unimpeachable authority the fact of his martyrdom or death for the Faith. Benedict XIV. refers to martyrdom as "the voluntary endurance of death for the Faith, or some other act of virtue relating to God." A martyr, he says, may not die for the Faith, but also to preserve some virtue as justice, obedience, chastity, or the like—himself or commanded by the Faith. Some martyrdoms in a baptism of blood which effaces all sins—both original and venial—and the Martyr is proclaimed a Saint. Hence the Martyrs are ranked in the second degree, and well as validated miracles as the countersigns of the Divine favor, and of their utmost power before she throws of God. But on the process of a Martyr for his beatification, proof is required either of virtue or of martyrdom. All that is necessary is to show an unimpeachable authority the fact of his martyrdom or death for the Faith. Benedict XIV. refers to martyrdom as "the voluntary endurance of death for the Faith, or some other act of virtue relating to God." A martyr, he says, may not die for the Faith only, but also to preserve some virtue as justice, obedience, chastity, or the like—commanded or counselled by the Faith. Some martyrdoms in a baptism of blood which effaces all sins—both original and venial—and the Martyr is proclaimed a Saint. Hence the Martyrs are ranked in the second degree, and well as validated miracles as the countersigns of the Divine favor, and of their utmost power before the throne of God.

Comparative Catholic Statistics.

There is something radically wrong in the statistical summaries published in the two Catholic Directories issued in this country, and the difference in very many instances is so great as to show palpable carelessness on the part of those entrusted with the compilation of matters of such importance. Here are a few samples hurriedly selected from the Ecclesiastical Summaries of the issues of 1886 before us:

	Priests in Ministry 1886	Priests in Ministry 1887
Florence R. Florence Diocese	17	186
Charleston	17	17
Priests in Missions and Lay Angelus	4	4
Priests in Missions and Lay Angelus	36	41
Chickasaw in Indian Territory	2	2
Priests in Diocese of Chicago	36	41
" " Alton	130	30
Chicago Diocese	41	41
" " Alton	132	66
" " Little Rock	15	15
" " Alton	129	66
" " Oregon	30	34
" " Alton	66	66
" " San Fran.	65	71

These discrepancies are sufficient to show how erroneously each statistical summary is compiled, and we may add that there is scarcely a diocese in the Union where there is not some discordance between the Sadlier and the Hoffman Directories.

We might go even further and say that in several instances the figures in the body of the work giving Diocesan statistics, do not agree with the totals given in the Summary, showing that no statistician (in the true meaning of the term) has charge of that department in either publication.

In the Diocese of San Francisco there are actually 95 churches, while Sadlier's summary returns 87 and Hoffman's summary reports 124. There are fifty-six colleges, academies and parochial schools in this Diocese, whilst Sadlier's Directory returns thirty-six and Hoffman's Directory gives forty-eight. Such figures are worse than useless so far as being a source where from statistics concerning the Church may be considered.

Again, the correct number of churches in Sacramento Diocese is seventy-six; the proper number of stations is one hundred. Sadlier's Directory gives them as fifty seven churches and ninety stations, Hoffman's figures being the same. The correct number of parochial schools in this Diocese is thirty, whilst Hoffman's Directory returns seventeen—and Sadlier's pollyanish returns thirteen.

Nothing is more valuable than correct statistics, but when figures are the work of gather in a haphazard fashion, they become only a meaningless jumble of figures, and useless to the public at large, since, therefore, when they ought to be thoroughly reliable, we hope, therefore, that the compilers of both publications will hitherto give more attention to this evidently neglected portion of their work.

Brother McCrary on the Pope's Jubilee.

It would be just as sensatural for a Methodist preacher to tell the truth about the Popes! Notwithstanding all the pains he has taken to ridicule Brother McCrary out of his ignorance and bigotry combined, he seems determined to keep up his solid course to the great scandal of saints and sinners alike. Of course he had to allude to the Popes Jubilee, and he did so after the usual mean way which all Methodist preachers always whenever they choose to distract from the merit of the Vicar of Christ. Alluding to President Cleveland's gift to the Holy Father, Brother McCrary says:

"All the powers and potentates, and President Cleveland, as a citizen like, and as governor of the Constitution of the United States, which, we have seen, is not a Christian document. His predecessors have issued all of his leading principles in all possible ways." Such assertions are disreputable to him who gives them currency as they are abominable in the eyes of that few who love truth in every man. So far from the great Pontiff now gloriously reigning "hating the American Constitution, it will be clear to all impartial minds that he is more in accord with its principles in demanding its own liberty than are those few preachers of Methodism who transgress God's law by bearing false witness against him.

We decline to follow Brother McCrary the evidence in possession that any Pontiff ever "cursed" the principles embodied in the Constitution of the United States as some Protestant sects, and what makes the matter worse we learn from Sadlier's "Catholic Movements" in the present issue that the Congressional Library contains no such "curse." Such a document as that would be a most valuable one, and it would give a more extensive notoriety than Saint as well as the foes for getting the blessing for the use of such of the Rev. Clergy as may feel inclined to use it.

Farm and Home.

Health Hints.

FOR EARACHE—One pint of sweet milk and a handful of pokeberry roots. This is a sure cure.

OLD SORES—First cleanliness, normal bowels, and a vegetable alterative are the only curative measures.

COLD FEET—Use a foot-bath each night of cold water, with two tea-spoons of Fuller's Earth thrown into the water.

TO PREVENT HAIRSORE, or the hair turning gray prematurely, go with head uncovered or wear a properly ventilated hat.

SORE EYES—Dissolve sixteen grains of acetate of zinc in half a pint of soft water (rain water is best), and apply to the eyes several times a day.

DRINK—Take one teacupful, twice daily, of the following mixture. Decoct asparagus, 16 ounces, parsn. root, 1 scruple, mell scillic, one half ounce.

TAPE WORM—To expel this parasite, take equal parts tincture assafœtida and tincture aloetidin, in teaspoonful doses, night and morning. No fasting is necessary.

REMEDY FOR CANKER—Take the blossoms of red clover and make a tea of them, and drink freely. It will cure cancer in the stomach as well as on the surface.

BITTERS—All "bitters" offered for sale contain alcohol. Many take them in place of brandy, whiskey, rum and other forms of spirits, persuading themselves that they are reforming as to their beverage.

ASTHMA—Tincture belladonna in 10 drop dose, repeated every 15 or 30 minutes, will very often relieve the most severe attack of asthma. So also will nitrate of amyl, given in 5 to 10 drop doses every hour, if more than one dose is needed.

FISCHAN SUPPLES—A simple and safe means for relief of cracked nipples is to powder them regularly with powdered gum arabic. Immediately after the child has been nursed the powder should be dusted over the surface and the nipple protected from the air.

MEASLES—The room should be kept dark to protect the inflamed eyes. As long as the fever remains the patient should be kept in bed. Exposure may cause pneumonia, which, in other words, is acute inflammation of the lungs. Keep in the room as long as the cough lasts.

Home Cookery.

DROP CAKES—For eggs, one pint of milk, a little salt, and flour enough for a batter; bake in cups.

RUSKS—Two ounces sugar, three eggs, six ounces of flour, pinch of salt; to be dropped and sugar sprinkled on before baking.

POVERTY CAKE—Two cups cream, two cups stoned and chopped raisins, two cups sugar, four cups flour, one teaspoonful of soda, salt and spice.

FRIED FINE PASTRY—Make a batter, dip the fast into it. Fry in hot fat until brown. Make a little brown batter, then add a spoonful of vinegar to mix with them.

RICE CAKE—Two cups of sugar, one cup of butter, four eggs, one cup of cold water, three cups of flour, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, two cups of hickory nut meats.

LEMON SAUCE—Half a cup of butter, one cup of sugar, one egg, one grated lemon, three tablespoonfuls of boiling water; put in a tin pail and set in a pan of boiling water to thicken.

CRAB APPLES—One pint of sour milk, one even teaspoonful of soda, one egg, one dozen finely chopped clams, and flour enough to make a stiff batter; drop into boiling lard and fry until cooked.

SPONGE CAKE—Half a pound of powdered sugar, quarter of a pound of flour, four eggs, juice of one lemon. Drop from a spoon upon buttered paper; if the mixture runs add more flour. Bake in a quick oven.

PIE CRUST—Two cups of sugar, three-fourths of a cup of butter, whites of six eggs, one cup of milk, one pound of chopped dates, one cup of corn starch, two cups of flour, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder.

OAT EGG CAKE—One egg, one large spoonful of butter, two cups of sugar, one small cup of milk, two and a half cups of flour, two small teaspoonfuls of baking powder, cinnamon or lemon to flavor.

CREAM PIE—Part of scalded milk; two eggs; half a cup of flour mixed with milk; cup of sugar; any flavor that is preferred—almond is excellent. Use cup-cake, or any light cake, slightly warm. Pour the custard over it.

PLAIN CAKE—One and a half teacups of sugar, one half cup butter, one small cup sour milk, one teaspoonful saleratus, flavor mix, flavor with nutmeg. Roll one-half inch thick, cut in round cakes, and bake quickly.

A NICE MEETER FOR BREAKFAST—Two cups of oatmeal, one cup of flour, one large spoonful of butter, one large spoonful molasses, one small teaspoonful soda. Use milk enough to make the batter about like griddle cakes.

Family Fun.

Giving a Parson Points.

A young man who recently graduated from an Eastern theological school went out to Murray, in the Central Alaska country, to take charge of a church. The largest congregation he had ever had since his ordination the first Sunday, one table on which Spanish moss was usually dealt being left for him to stand behind. A large stuck against him, and on this which was supposed to represent the Bible. The whole town turned out, and the young divine preached a powerful sermon. In it he strongly denounced gambling, horse-racing, drinking and profanity. That afternoon he was called upon by a committee of leading citizens, one of whom said:

"Perdner, thar's a little matter we'd like to talk over with ye. I am the chairman of the vigilance committee."

"Is it possible?"

"Mighty possible, captain, the consecutest possible thing ye ever seed. We've come here to ask ye not to interfere with our preachin'."

"I am very sorry that such is the case, but I don't see how I can change it."

"Can't help! Well I reckon you'll have to. We've got to lay upon your hollerns' agin gambling an' horse racin' an' swearin' an' licker. Them things are all lowable here, an' air highly recommended by the leadin' citizens, and the chief has got leff fail yer line. As a committee we mosyed up here to warn ye, an' 'taint anyuse to warn more'n once.

"But, my dear sir, what can I preach against—I must denounce something."

"What can ye preach agin? Why, I swan, Hain't ther' enough wickedness in this country 'thout goin' outen yer way to jump on yer sech things? Preach agin hose stealing an' jumpin' mineral claims, or somethin'. Ketch yer hosses an' git! Git!"

Then there's regional an—ice that up once in a while. Jed Jenkins (proud to show things an' the boys aid jes' crowd in to cheer yer every time ye make a pint.

Why He Accepted the Call.

An old darkey, who is an antebellum and miles from Winston, and who was engaged in the ministry last year, has given up his profession and is now dealing in animal spirits. The reason for his change is given as follows: "When I preached, I never got more than fifteen cents an day, while now I make from $2 to $3 for de same occupation time. There is bigger kin' of difference in dem figgers, you know, and you know farther dat dem dollars is well folks in arter dem days.

The Old Men.

Mr. Blobbs—Marsh, hadn't I better take then has to market?

Marsh—She's about 40 years old, Zeke, an' I'm afraid she'll spoil our treds. Better think of some other way of getting rid of her.

"I might give her to the editor in payment for our subscription."

"I paid that yesterday in last year's turnip."

"Well, we'll save her for the next donation party."

The Feminine Characteristic.

Elsie—You say you do as you like, Edith; but you don't always, do you?

Edith—No, not always. I do as mamma wants to, sometimes.

Elsie—Yes, I see. You do as mamma does.

Edith—How that!

Elsie—She does as papa wants when papa wants her to do as she wants, and when papa doesn't she does as she wants.

Edith—Yes, I guess that's about the way of it. Big folks are just like little folks, after all, only more so.

And then they went on making mud pies, which they had been forbidden by their mammas to do.

Mirth Provoking Paragraph.

Father—Here you're been married four weeks, and almost every day you come to me with complaints about your husband. You ought to be ashamed of yourself.

Daughter—But he fights me all the time.

Father—Foolish child! Haven't your mother and I been fighting every day for thirty years, and don't we get along peacefully and quietly with each other?

"I generally pick my company," said Mrs. Yount, haughtily. "Yes, I am aware of it," replied Mrs. Crimscoback, sarcastically. "But you wait until after they have left your house and then you pick them to pieces."

Little brother (whose sister is playing cards with a gentleman)—Mr. Smiler, does Minnie play cards well?

Mr. Smiler—Yes, very well, indeed.

L. B.—Then you'd better look out. Ma said if she played her cards well she would catch you.

"We don't care for the rain," said one Baltimore girl to another, as she raised an umbrella; "we're neither sugar nor salt." "No," replied the other, "but we're lemon."

In Chicago. The lady is leaning on the arm of an elegant and wealthy young man, and leading her little daughter by the hand. Little Daughter—(Oh, ma, ma, look there! See that gentleman on the other side. Don't you know him!

Ma—N no, my dear.

L.D.—Why, mamma! he ana papa lost year.

"I thought you took an unusual interest in my welfare," remarked an unsuccessful lover. "No indeed," she replied, "only in your farewell."

Wife—John, why didn't you wake me up last night during the fire on the next block?

Husband—It didn't amount to much.

Wife—Well, the next time I wish you'd let me know it, you know I can't sleep if there is a fire anywhere near.

Boston Girl—And there is a good deal of culture in the West, then!

Chicago Girl—Oh, yes; we don't like to boast of it, but when it comes down to the necessity of showing our stuff, you bet we have them.

Vick's Floral Guide.

A silver lining—every cloud! With the short crop of early Wilder seeds the closer half days and Vick's beautiful annual, and Seeding already appears not far distant. We can almost see the growing grass and the blooming flowers. In the way of landscape, Vick's Floral Guide is unrivaled in artistic appearance, and the edition of each year that appears simply perfect, is surpassed the next. CARDINAL MANNING

Modern Egotism and Infidelity.

THE LAW OF HEREDITY IN EVIL.

Will the World Ever be Converted?

The Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster recently preached on the "Church and the World," at the Pro-Cathedral. Amongst His Eminence took for his text the words of St. Paul "The wisdom of the flesh is the enemy of God, for it is not subject to the will of God, neither can it be." and after explaining that the words "the wisdom of the flesh" meant man in his blind and lust without God, and there were two others, the Divine and the diabolical. In the Divine order the will of man is in conformity with and dependent on the eternal intelligence of God; the will of man is perfectly submissive and conformed and subject to the will of God; and, therefore, the heart of man was in obedience to the will that was conformed to God. That was more or less the state of all those who were living a life of faith—perfect to be surmounted by a mistake, but not in perfection because man's nature had been wounded by the Fall; nevertheless, by faith his intellect was conformed to the intelligence of God, his will was conformed to the will of God, and his heart was conformed to the law of God. But beneath that Divine order there was a diabolical order, and that was where the intellect of man got its dependence on the intelligence of God and became a law to itself, and finally when the heart of man became rebellious and indulged itself in defiance of the law of God. That was the diabolical order in which men and women sought out themselves in a moment. And what was the consequence? this! First there was what was called independence of the intellect—when the intellect refused to be subject to the intelligence and revelation of God, to the lights of nature, and the laws of nature, when man refused to depend on the Eternal Reason, and claimed to be what Satan promised, Gods in Paradise she should become—"Ye shall be as God"—for when man does not believe in God he becomes a god unto himself. And when the will has become rebellious, insubordinate, what has remained? There is no law left except a man's own inclinations, because he can blind his own conscience, he can feel all manner of excuses, and plausible reasons for acting as he likes best. And when the intellect is perverted, and when the will has followed that perversion, then the passions become turbulent. There are three great provinces of the human soul. The first is pride—the sin of the angel—which has been well defined as "an insolent desire of our own proper excellence. It is quite lawful to desire perfection it becomes sinful when we try to build up the perfection of our own, like a Tower of Babel, to reach to heaven. Out of this come all manner of ambitious, high and low, noble and base—all the concerns about honors and names and titles, and precedents, and the follies and fashions of this world.

THE SIN OF SELF-INTELLIGENCE.

And then there springs up, thirdly, a self-intelligence, a full-swing of our own things and doctrines, which grows into sensuous and sensual and earthly, full of self consciousness and self-pity, full of murmuring and complaining if anything go wrong, realizing the words of searching reason in Holy Scripture: "Sin that lireth in pleasures is dead while she liveth." These are the three powers of the intellect, the will and the heart to which the soul will come that is not subject to God and submissive to Him. Such is the world or the worldly character in the individual. What is the world as distinct from such one's individual state? Look at history in the Holy Scriptures. The first sin of Adam grew until the world was so overspread by sin that the world was destroyed by the Flood. God again from the Flood till the call of Abraham, who was called out of the midst of idolatrous people who had fallen away from God. Read again the history of Abraham to the time of Moses, who came from the patriarchal and pure life of the earlier Fathers of Israel to the intense and multiplied and manifold

CORRUPTIONS AND VICES OF EGYPTIANDOM.

Look at the book of the Prophet Hosea, and how this great law of accumulation was perpetually going on. Nations are made up of individuals, and this has taken place in every nation of the world. Look at Greece. The sublime and pensive characters are to be found in its early history; nothing more pure than the corrupt literature of its latter history can be conceived. Its manhood became effeminate, and the name of Greek became a by-word in the Roman world. Once more, take the great Empire of Rome itself. In its early days there was in it a manhood and a virtue—and the very word virtue signified courage—and the virtue of that great race was known and was a tradition of prince even to those who became corrupt, but the accumulation of vice brought down that great Empire to such a condition of internal corruption, that there was nothing for it but to be swept of the face of the earth. Was there ever anything worse than that? Yes. The Roman Empire was Pagan or Heathen, and in one sense bad to be better, but after Constantine, when the Empire became Christian, it was translated to Byzantium, which became Constantinople, and all the refinement of the Roman Empire was, as far as possible, concentrated there with an intensity of luxury of every kind. What was its history? Anything more base, anything more corrupt, than the state into which it fell could not be described. There was a perpetual accumulation of evil going on. Why and how? Because nations when they were in contact with one another, communicated to each other those several vices and corruptions.

THE FREE TRADE IN EVIL.

There is a sort of free trade in evil between nations and they interchange and adopt all the follies and evils which are called by literature and by conversation, the personal influence, by habitation—sometimes dwelling and returning—until at last the evil accumulation overwhelms; and as nations are made up of individuals the world is made up of nations, and the accumulated evils run together into one flood. Look at Paris and see the Dry Drains laid open as for this when He said, "When the Son of Man cometh, shall He find the faith on the earth?" The question seems hardly "If it implies a doubt. And again: "Even as iniquity hath abounded the charity of many shall waxen cold." Look at what St. Paul speaks of the times when "men shall be lovers of themselves" and "lovers of pleasure more than of God, having the form of Godliness without the power." And it is to be borne in mind that this accumulation is handed down as an inheritance and as a heirloom. These were three great laws of the world written upon the stony hearts of unbelievers and of infidels. Thus, the question of the world whatever is contrary is called pleasure—that is the opinion of the world. The last law of the world is what they call the spirit. Every age has a spirit of its own, and we are known unto this day of our age. Look at this great city. How many there are who, through a fault of their own, are borne into house on worthy of the name, into a restrictive atmosphere, into the midst of every form of temptation that can degrade, outrage, and ruin. Is it humanly merciful, supposing impossible, His picture is not a little justice like the picture of man. He weighed the sin, and will know how to deal with those, who have left the blessings enjoyed by the Children of the Church. The final sin that still remained unmentioned was, he was speaking of what it seems to him therefore that he had been acquiring power commensurate with the circumstances of his position. Nothing was so contrary to God, but as far as he could see the world would never be so conscious of the wisdom of the flesh as the enemy of God and not subject to the law of God, neither can it be.

REV. LAWRENCE SERRA,

Tributes of Respect from His Brothers and Pupils of St. Joseph's Academy, Oakland.

It is indeed a very sorrowful duty, and it is with a very sorrowful heart we pen a few words of regret which our brothers and pupils of St. Joseph's Academy, Oakland, have asked us to write, and which we feel we can do but very feebly, from our inability to express our sympathy with our brothers and our sorrow for the loss of our beloved Father, who was the opportunist and gladly accepted the call to his reward. We know that he is happy in the Divine Presence, and we know that his work will be rewarded, and that his memory will be cherished by the world with all the fervor of a true and noble heart. We know that he has left behind him a monument of his labors, which will outlast the marble and bronze, and that his memory will be perpetuated by the hearts of those who have been the recipients of his bounty, and who have been the recipients of his bounty, and who have been the recipients of his bounty, and

Poetry.

FROM THE GERMAN.

HYMN.

Fondly do we pray, dear Mother,
Daily calls we fall of love;
Tender is thy hand each other,
As they do in Heaven above.

Smile ever on our pathway, Virgin,
As thou smilest on every saint!
Drive away sad sin, sin's sighing
Each stainless brow to taint.

Through our gloom and through our sadness,
Fondly beam upon us, holiest!
Bear in our joy and gladness,
Cast a gentle heavenly light.

Stay us when we falter!
In this world of object woe,
While the tomb of Time's cold finger
Lays our fairest hopes below;

Be our guiding star, dear Mother,
Onward as we roam,
Teaching us to show each other
The path that leads to home.

Then fondly do we gaze, dear Mother,
On thy features lit with love;
Smile on us while here, dear Mother,
And in Heaven above.

FROM THE GERMAN.

DEAD.

Now fold the hands so white and cold
Upon the pulseless breast,
And gently close the dim eyes
In Death's unbroken rest.

No toils shall stain thee more
No tears shall dim the eyes,
No earthly cares again shall wake
The burning storm of sighs.

No toiling bells nor lowe'l fare
Announce a hero's death;
No wonderous tales of daring deeds
Are told with bated breath.

And yet, as name on Fame's bright i'ovoll,
A greater victory won,
Than he who lies so silent there,
"Unknown and unsung."

Not his, the gift to thrill mens' hearts
Like orators of old;
Not his, the hands to turn all things,
As Midas did—to gold.

Or self, and passions wild and strong,
A noble victory gained—
A noble life for others lived,
Unsolish and unstained.

The lessons from that humble life
Dare be to bless.
Than those who bound immortal wine
From Fortune's fleeting brim.

And as ye gently place him in
His narrow home of clay,
Amidst shedes a requiem sing,
Celestial harpists play.

FROM THE WRITINGS OF
"GOD KNOWS"

In a burying-ground of the far, far West,
Where blest life of the shipwrecked lie,
Through and bushdrown loam, like flocks of Flowers by the sea hard by,
And massed in marble, with many a trace
Of the whistling wind a'surprised,
In a tablet shine as an upturned iron
When the spirit of life hath fled,
With "Died drown" brokenly carved thereon,
Like a job that has stiffened above the
Like a sob that is knotted in breast and throat
Long after its voice ceasedst,
That hath "Died drown" said death's wind rose
To the render of tombs appeals.
The child's light body those dulcies dark—
The sole one washed ashore
From the eastward North-feel'ill starved wreck
And her wave-beloved human stove—
The only body of all who drowned,
Nameless and mute, that was ever found.

The old priest passed in the funeral rites—
"The name of the dead?" quoth he.
"God knows," said the clerk of the parish kirk,
And the wall of the dark, deep sea,
With only those words on the bankless gray,
Which so much to the heart express,
Was folded away to the judgment day
"Neath the firm's of the far, far West!
And ever at haul, in a solemn deep,
Who wind and the waves their replies keep.

And the nights at morn and the sun at noon,
And the stars when the day is dim,
And the wind of noon, too, in the shimmer of dew,
Wheel over the ceaseless sea.
But God, in His infinite goodness knows
What liquid name and rare
From lips seraphic in mute flows
When they speak to our wail up there!
God knows! In the north's maternal breast
Unnamed and titled find repair!

MARJORIE.

"Oh, dear," said Farmer Brown one day,
"I never can catch weather!
The rain will spoil my meadow hay
And all my crops together."

His little daughter climbed his knee:
"I guess the sun will shine," said she.

"But if the sun," said Farmer Brown,
"Should bring a dry September,
With vines and stalks all wilted down,
And fields scorched to an ember—"

"Why, then I will pray," said Marjorie,
The little girl upon his knee.

"Ah, no!" sighed Farmer Brown that fall,
"Now what's the use of living!
No plan of mine succeeds at all"—

"Why, next month comes Thanksgiving
And then, of course," said Marjorie,
"We're all so happy as can be."

"Well, what should I be thankful for?"
Asked Farmer Brown. "My trouble
This summer has grown more and more,
My losses have been double.

I've nothing left"—"Why, you get one!"
Said Marjorie, upon his knee.

GOD'S COMFORTER.

What time the Christ to Calvary was led
And hung all bleeding on the cross of shame, While frowning hordes reviled and mocked His pane
O'er thorns the golden aureole's form was shed
When a'er His face death's deadly pallor spread,
And one great cry of anguish shook His frame,
Or, rapid wine a pitying soldier's hand
And fettered sorrowful about His head.

From out the wounded brow, with anger lash,
The robes plashed a thorn, when, His a tear,
Upon its breast one drop of life-blood fell,
And ever now the blessed brand will speak
From every robe's bosom, of the dear
And tender pity that He knew so well.

A Beautiful Catholic Story.

The wind was stirring. It was blowing in sudden gusts along the coast from the north west and striking inland at the opening between the tall cliffs of an old Norman town. The tide was nearly high and the weather so rough that the water frequently splashed over the edge of the quay. The young smacks lying alongside creaked and strained as they rose, threatening to get loose from their moorings. The quay was crowded, for these fishing boats had run into the harbor with the tide, and nearly every hand was busy helping to unload them. The fishermen were passing baskets filled with fish up the ladders from the depths of the vessels, and the baskets of fish were being tossed into large tubs of fresh water. Four times tubs women carried packed the fish in pannniers, ready for removal in the carts which waited hard by. It was an animated scene, full of noise and movement, for the south the only unactive figure was a young fisher girl. She had been looking intently seaward, and had now turned away. Her face wore a painful expression and her lips were parted as though in anticipation of some danger.

The girl's dress was a blue woolen of coarse material. A head of white knitted worsted covered her head and shoulders, leaving her fair hair to cluster about the knee. She belonged to that type of blonde not uncommon among the Norman peasantry. Her face was round and dimpled; and the head to which it was coquettishly framed gave it the soft and simple expression of a child. In her motionless attitude, in the mode of this busy crowd, she resembled a statue in a market-place of some village.

"Helloo there!" cried a fisherman, who was stationed at the head of a ladder which reached down into one of the boats. "Haul up the lamp! We shall soon be in the dark."

The sun had set, and black clouds were gathering towards the horizon. The fisherman was a short, powerful man of 40 or 45. A thick fringe of black hair curled round his honest, weather-beaten face, and a red cap with a tassel was adjusted to the shape of his head. His throat was enveloped in a great woolen wrapper. He had the appearance of a Hercules as he stood on the quay receiving one weighty basket after another.

The girl, who was now close behind him on the quay, looked round as he gave the order in a bluff, honest voice.

"Marcel," said she timidly, "the Lionne is not yet in port."

The man glanced towards the sea. Above the horizon the clouds had thickened, picturing black masses in the sky.

"Wone luck," he replied, "she will be caught in the storm."

As he uttered this prediction a change became apparent in the sea. A dark shadow was creeping across it, the shore, and the waves which this shadow crossed were white with foam. It was another sign of the approaching storm, and to a sailor's mind, upon the coast. As though night had suddenly descended without warning, the harbor was thrown into semi-darkness, and with the gloom the wind swept round the quay and howled about the rigging of the fishing smacks. The creaking and straining of the boats now sounded a protest against the threatened gale.

The girl uttered a low cry, and her eyes sought Marcel's face.

"Pauline," said the sailor, looking round, "is Fernand on board?"

"Yes," she replied in a distracted tone. "He will be lost"—

"Courage, my girl," said Marcel. Fernand is a brave and able seaman."

Pauline appeared slightly reassured.

"He is indeed brave," she said with grave fervency. "Whom you protect him."

She raised her eyes, and her lips moved as though in prayer. Then she glanced about with a look of anxiety. The crowd upon the quay were still working, in spite of the rough wind, with dogged energy. The boat had to be discharged, and the herring purchased while fresh to the inland towns. The Paris market needed the supply, and the owners of the fishing smacks, fearing to lose their profit, were moving about like taskmasters among silling slaves.

Pauline turned and ran along the quay.

"It was now quite dark. Lanterns hung suspended from the masts of every fishing smack, and the lamps had been lighted in the roadway. The windows of the Cafe de la Plaire, the fisherman's favorite wine shop, began to brighten as the sky in every quarter assumed the aspect of night.

At the summit of the cliff, directly above the harbor, stood the lighthouse. It revolved slowly, and its brightness was like a gigantic eye regarding the storm.

Crossing the drawbridge, which separated the harbor from the dock, Pauline reached the foot of the cliff. A steep pathway led in serpentine curves, towards the lighthouse. The girl began to ascend, and her movement was full of vigor and purpose.

When she had almost reached the height and had come to the walls of a romantic ruin, she noticed a flock of sheep huddled together. A black shaggy dog was running restlessly to and fro. The shepherd, a huge man, wrapped from head to foot in a thick sheepskin cloak, turned to look down at her.

At this elevated point, near the top of the cliff, the force of the wind nearly raised the girl off her feet; but the shepherd stood facing the weather, erect and motionless.

Pauline hurried toward him.

"Pierre Le Tour," she demanded frantically, with her hand upon his arm, "did you see any fishing boats about sunset out at sea?"

The shepherd pointed towards the West.

"Yon pinnacle," said he, "just before sunset, I saw a sail."

"The Lionne?" cried Pauline, "was it not Pierre?"

Pierre Le Tour, who had wandered for many years over these Normandy hills, knew every fishing boat by sight which left the port. To watch the vessels that passed along the coast was almost the only distraction he had in life. He had a keen eye, and could distinguish one sail from another distinctly, as here did distinguish the forms of his flock.

"Yes, said he, "it was the Lionne. All the other boats have come in safe."

While speaking they had continued to ascend the cliff side. They now stood at the outer walls of the ruin. The light house glared down upon them a few steps above. A rocking ray sought Pauline looking up eagerly at the shepherd. Her face was pale and distressful.

"Fernand Demarc is on board

"Your betrothed

"Yes, Pierre."

"Then why," he demanded, "have you come here to pray, and she, "God, Fernand may be saved."

While these old Norman ruins stood a little chapel, it was all that remained of an ancient monastery. This small building, known as La Chapelle de la Vierge, was a famous shrine, to which fishermen and their wives made a pilgrimage once a year from all parts of Normandy. Pauline passed between the crumbled walls, and came to a broken archway. In a corner, through this archway, was a small door leading into the chapel. The girl raised the latch and stepped in.

The chapel was almost in darkness. Near the entrance was a small table upon which there stood a tall, thin taper. It gave out but a feeble light. Beside it by a quantity of similar tapers, ranged in a row ready for lighting. Close to this table, in a low chair, sat an old woman. She was fast asleep, her head on her chest and wrinkled. Her white hair was born forward, and her long pointed chin was resting on her breast. Above the chair a lamp was burning among the black shadows. It was as sombre and silent a place as the entrance to a sepulchre. The only sound was the wind, which moaned round the ruin, and the only sight was the sea, which sometimes glared up the side and sank down upon the silent steps, clasping her hands in prayer.

Pauline Delille had known her lover ever since she was a child. They had lived all their lives in the same village—the village of Barval—and when Pauline had reached womanhood Fernand had asked her to be his wife. The young sailor had lately inherited a small farm through the death of his father; and it had been his intention, as soon as the herring season was over, to give up the sea and marry Pauline. The marriage had been fixed to take place on a month's time.

That day the girl had pictured Fernand, as she had so often seen him, steering the Lionne into harbor—a strong figure stationed at the helm, a brave face with dark and wind-dried eyes. And such was the picture which now before her mind as she knelt upon the altar steps in the little chapel praying for Fernand's safe deliverance from the perils and dangers of the sea.

Suddenly a vivid flash of lightning filled every corner of the chapel with its ghastly, quivering brightness. The white, stone floor, worn by the tread of many a generation of pilgrims, the large, pointed window over the altar, representing the Virgin and Child in the dark-taken beams of the arched roof—all became for an instant as distinct as through the glare of sunlight had looked in. Then followed a clap of thunder, which sounded as if the cliff close by had fallen with a crash into the sea.

Pauline Delille started to her feet with a painful cry upon her white lips.

She fled towards the chapel door, and hurried out into the storm. In a sheltered corner among the ruins Pauline found the terrified flock bleating piteously. The shepherd was not there. The girl stopped and peered into the darkness. Another flash revealed him, she recognized his troupe, and broke the silence of the cliff. Pierre Le Tour, cautiously forward, calling in a kindly name.

"Pierre le Tour

He heard her, for as she spoke to Pauline was him approaching.

"Pauline, said he, as she reached his side, "if I am a blind man, I hear."

"You have seen her

"Yes."

"Where!

The shepherd seized her arm.

"Come, he replied, "I will show you."

She yielded helplessly, concentrating to be led his strong hand. The cliff side was at that moment as much before her the wind and rain were beating in her face, and she was half dead with terror and expectation.

After ascending a few steps to the summit of the cliffs Pierre le Tour stopped. Pauline heard the waves breaking with a deafening roar 100 feet below them.

"Look!" said Pierre, "look towards the sea and wait."

Pauline obeyed. But she had scarcely waited a moment, with her eyes strained eagerly seaward, when another flash of lightning quivered out of the dark clouds. The whole expanse of an angry sea was illuminated, and upon the waves the girl descried a large fishing smack with a broken sail, and at the helm was the man for whose safety she had been praying. It was like a vivid vision impressed upon her brain, for in another second the scene was enveloped in black night.

"Fernand!" she cried in a piteous tone. "He's making for the harbor."

Breathless with excitement, and with a fast beating heart, Pauline descended, grasping her way swiftly by the same path up which she had climbed not half an hour before, with such resolution and piety. The lights in the harbor and in the town beyond were shining brightly now. Pauline fancied as she approached that she could even distinguish dark figures moving about, still long upon the quay, landing the cargoes of herring from the fishing smacks, and passing in and out of the Cafe de la Plaire across the road way. Notone, the girl thought, could have the least suspicion that the Lionne was labouring out in the storm, and in vain to the entrance of the port The news would transform the scene.

The last lamp leading on to the quay was at last reached and crossed, and Pauline once more stood in the midst of the active crowd of workers. She glanced about in search of her friend Marcel, the powerful sailor who had left in the act of handling heavy baskets of fish at the head of the ladder. He was no longer standing at his post.

His girl husband towards the quay. She had not seen Marcel then with a pitying look. He looked inquiringly as she approached.

"Your boy Marcel" cried Pauline, clasping her hands. "Oh, he

"The Lionne is trying to enter the harbor, exclaimed the girl, as she finished her sentence aloud. Thousands at a moment to close Sainte Fanny, Marcel sprang into the jet. The cafe was crowded.

"Hi the crowd, in a chorus!

Every one was anxious to hear the news.

Marcel repeated the story.

The news which Pauline had brought spread like wildfire. The excitement in the harbor became general. Her sailors on board the fishing smacks left their work and went with Marcel on a hurrying crowd towards the jetty. Pauline Delille was among the foremost.

The jetty was long and narrow, and curved gradually out to sea. At the extreme end it continues to the harbor, a bright red lamp was burning steadily. Towards this red lamp the crowd advanced, against the wind which blew in their faces with such sudden and powerful gusts. Oh! it was difficult to make much headway. Every wave that broke against the jetty covered these hardy people with a shower of spray.

Marcel was the first to reach the jetty head, and Pauline was still close beside him. Looking seaward, the sailor's keen eye Marcel perceived a faint light rising and falling among the waves. He pointed it out to the girl.

"That's the Lionne," said he, "she is steering up against the tide. We are not lost a moment too soon."

He then turned to the men and gave his instructions in a calm, commanding voice. Every rope was quickly got in readiness to render aid, as Fernand Demarc's boat was hauled forward and firmly attached, and every man was speedily stationed at his post prepared for action.

Pauline Delille leaned eagerly over the low wall of the quay. She watched the light on board the Lionne as it rose and fell, and was sometimes hidden entirely behind huge waves. Slowly it approached nearer and nearer toward the narrow entrance to the harbor. But there was the slightest miscalculation, or the least mistake in the sailor, and the boat would be dashed to pieces against the projecting masses. Those few moments of suspense seemed to her like a lifetime, her agony was terrible when she reflected that they might be her lover's last moments on earth. In many days they had passed together in their native village, and the plans they had formed of the future, rose up in her mind like a cruel cross, the sense of bereavement and despair and yet she had no confidence in Fernand, the pilot could guide a boat with greater skill.

Closer and closer came the light towards the harbor, and at some moments was so completely hidden that Pauline thought it was sunk with a sudden fear that the Lionne had sunk, never to rise again. But presently a loud shout from the crowd announced the safety of the vessel. Over a wretch's cross mast, the light was seen shining where the lamps on each side of the jetty shone out in the darkness. Pauline Delille started to her feet with a cry of fervent prayer to Heaven for the safety of her lover.

Into the great wave upon which the Lionne was lifted into port had swept a man upon whom another wave had cast her, and swept back and struck the base of the boat with such force that it was dashed to pieces. Pauline saw the man, and before Pauline saw a cry of fervent prayer from the crowd, but it was quickly stunned, for Marcel the muscular fisherman, had opening upon the wall of the jetty, with a rope bound round his waist. In another moment he had been lowered into the sea.

A moment of terrible suspense followed. Marcel and Pierre, a fisher were struggling half hidden by the surf, and in early entrance to the harbor. A single wave sought, without warning, dash both men against a wall of the jetty and deprive them of life. But the men were both excellent swimmers, and well knew their danger, and meanwhile they were being carried further into the harbor out of the roughest sea. Fernand had now got near enough to his friend Marcel to reach him with a rope, and they both keep themselves afloat while swimming side by side. At the same time a large boat from the harbor, manned by young fishermen, was making toward them, every stroke of their oars was watched by Pauline in the agonizing intensity of hopefulness and dread. Could, she thought, such a terrible contest be much longer sustained? The struggle was enough to exhaust the best of swimmers. But the boat reached them at last, though none too soon for the two men, who lifted into the boat were more dead than alive with cold and fatigue. They were taken, amid great excitement upon the quay, into the inner harbor and the first face when Fernand Demarc sought sight of as he was carried up the steps on to the quay, was his sweetheart—the face of Pauline.

As long as she lived Pauline never forgot that night. In after years, when seated with her children round the fire, she would recount to them how their father was caught in that storm, and how their friend, the brave Marcel, saved his life. And every year, on the day of the pilgrimage, she accompanied the story of her and offered up a prayer of thanksgiving in the little chapel among the ruins of the old Norman monastery.

CATHOLIC HOME ALMANAC FOR 1898.

There are several Catholic Almanacs published in the United States, but for Home serves three to none of them equal to the Catholic Home Calendar, published by Messrs. Benziger Brothers. The form For Home is a beautiful chromo-lithograph frontispiece, and nearly the price of the Almanac itself. Many engravings, in colors, of Sacred Subjects, note for large relief pages of stories, essays, anecdotes, poetry, and spiritual readings, from such eminent personages as Right Rev. John J. Keane, D. D., Bishop of Richmond; Rev. R. H. Dawey, S. J.; Rev. Martin S. Brosnan, Rev. Maurice F. Egan; Christian Reid; Rose Mulholland; Eunice C. Donnelly; Anna T. Sadlier; Eleanor C. Donnelly; Mary M. Molloy, and other Catholic writers.

This cheap and valuable home treasure is sold for twenty-five cents, and may be had through A. Waldteufel, 737 Market street, or at all Catholic book stores on the Pacific Coast. Agents desiring to purchase on receipt of twenty-five cents.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

—Among the Jubilee gifts offered to the Pope was a contrivance by a French engineer named Arnaud for ringing large church bells by electricity.

—The Trappist Missionaries in South Africa are doing wonderful work in converting the Kafirs. At one time of the Trappists, accompanied by the first Catholic Zulu ever in Great Britain, is staying in London and awaking sympathy in every section for the noble work of his community.

—The great organ of St. Agnes' church, of Brooklyn, which is to rank among the most massive instruments in the world, was formally opened on Christmas morning. It has 9,000 pipes, four banks of keys, three octaves of pedals and a full chime of bells. The reeds include a four, eight and sixteen foot trumpet. The power for the bellows is furnished by a hydraulic engine.

—Among other persons received into the Catholic Church last month by Father Bernard Vaughn, S. J., of The Holy Name Mission, were the Rev. R. F. R. Cordner, an Anglican clergyman, and his wife. Mr. Conder, who was looked upon as one of the rising Anglican preachers in London, is descended from a Huguenot family which went over to England to escape persecution in France.

—Writing from Rome, on a recent occasion, a correspondent says: A pair of finely embroidered cosy slippers have always been a favorite present. But all such demonstrations of affection or appreciation of religious benefits fade into nothingness before what is now happening at Rome. The Pope is having slippers literally showered on him on this the occasion of his Jubilee. Up to New Year's Day he had twelve thousand pairs sent, and the cry is, "Still they come."

—Many Israelites and Prohtpetians look upon the introduction of an organ into the Synagogue or Meeting-house as the first sign of decadence for their respective religions. A Canadian orthodox Jew warns his English brethren against "worship reform," and draws this dreadful down-grade sketch of the results of introducing organs into synagogues: Organ, pews, Christian choir; hats off, microscopic prayer books; abolition of the Hebrew; pork and oysters; Chanukah Christmas; intermarriage; the Sunday Sabbath; no God; no Judaism.

—Those who condemn the "Plan of Campaign" may very well be recommended to study the eulogies given by the Middlesborough Commission, and then they may be somewhat better qualified to speak of the morality of that powerful engine against landlordism. The tenants asked for an all-round reduction of 20 per cent.; the Commissioners have given reductions averaging 20½ per cent on the old rents. By this fact alone those who seem to do so may judge of the fairness of the claims of the Irish tenants.

—Here are some suggestive figures showing the disastrous influence which English rule has resulted in by its operation in Ireland: The population of Ireland in 1831 was 7,800,000, when the whole United Kingdom had 24,000,000—being a third of the whole. It had increased to 8,200,000 in 1841, and at the same ratio would be 9,000,000 in 1851, but it had fallen to 6,500,000, a loss of 2,500,000. But the decrease still goes on. The population is now under 5,000,000, being only a thirteenth of the United Kingdom, whereas in 1831 it was a third.

—An exchange says it has been discovered that a number of wealthy people in Cincinnati have placed their aged parents in old men's and old women's homes, in order to save themselves trouble. Four immense halls have been removed from one institution. This is one of the worst features of what is fashionably called "modern civilization." We know of a case where a very eminent member of the American Judiciary discharged with having permitted his poor, old Irish father to have died in a poor house in Illinois, while he himself literally wore "purple and fine linen."

—A telegram from the East states that at a meeting held in Washington, D. C., last week, which was presided over by Cardinal Gibbons, the plans and purposes of the new Catholic University to be built in that city, were explained by Bishop Ireland of St. Paul and Bishop Keane of Richmond, Va. During his remarks Bishop Ireland stated that the earnestness of the Divinity building would be laid in about three months; that the centennial anniversary of the establishment of the Catholic Hierarchy of America would be celebrated in the autumn of 1889, and at the same time the beginning of the second century would be celebrated by the opening of the Divinity Department of the University, to be followed as rapidly as possible by Departments of Philosophy, Law, Medicine, etc.

—The expending of the Duke of Torlonia as Syndic of Rome has developed into being one of the most important events of the day. The Catholic and Liberal newspapers not only of Italy, but of other countries on the Continent, are speaking out very plainly on an incident which is believed to be the forerunner of a bitter struggle between Church and State in the Peninsula. Il Popolo Romano, an organ bitterly hostile to the Vatican, is, however, candid enough to admit that the Government has in this moment cares serious enough to make it feel the necessity of not adding to them the administration of the commune of Rome, which could, in any case, have been regulated at a more opportune moment and in a different manner. The Crispi Cabinet is evidently resolved to open fire on the Vatican, prompted, as it is, to revenge by the unexpected success of the Jubilee demonstration.

Sage Counsel from a Wise Teacher.

It is a great pity to see otherwise good Catholics Protestantize themselves, so to speak, through imitating the foibles and follies of the world, and Cardinal Manning, in a recent occasion, alluded to the fact that "those who love danger shall perish," when he thus cautioned Catholics against certain evil customs which are just as prevalent in San Francisco as they are in London or any other European capital.

"Within the Catholic Church," said his Eminence, "there were unhappily those who worshiped the world, its money, its titles, its fashions and follies. They ran after such honors as the world can give, and got in this world; they ran after a name or a title because they loved to have their mouths full of the names of Peter's throne, whose they may have seen once and would like to meet again; they worshipped fashion and the claims of the world, they bowed down to society, because their hearts were in the world, and they forgot the warning of the Evangelist: 'Love not the world, neither the things that are in this world, for if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him.' Let them apply these words to society, the play, the theatre, to their dress, and their books, &c., and draw their own conclusions. As regards the stage many do not know the harm they did themselves by frequenting the theatre. None know, or would know, until the Judgment Day, the harm done by the whole system. In dress Christian women were departing from the injunction of the apostle in two points especially, continence and modesty. As to literature, there was a time when books that were now to be seen on drawing-room tables would never have crossed the thresholds of our families. Again, there was a restless, morbid desire to know everybody, to be everywhere, to have all manner of people at our houses. All this led to laxness and sin in life."

A lax life, concluded the Cardinal, is a dead life; a strict life is a peaceful life, and a life; a strict life is a peaceful life, and the peace of conscience, springing from a strict life, is the peace of God, which "passeth all understanding." We must be in the world until God calls us out of it, but of the world we need not be. If we are united to our Divine Master the spirit of God dwells in us, and it matters not what may be our lot in life, however heavy its duty, how close and perilous even its temptations, God will not forsake us. He will fulfil His promise, "When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee, and the rivers shall not overflow thee, and when thou walkest in the fire, thou shalt not be burned, neither shall the flame kindle within thee."

Another Cry for Help!

A cablegram from Dublin says that William (Hinian has written a card in which he says there is urgent necessity for large American subscriptions of money at this time to help the Irish in their struggle. In addition to the expenditure needed to keep up the struggle, large sums are needed to indemnify persons prosecuted under Balfour's coercion laws.

It is to be earnestly hoped, therefore, that every reason of the Irish National Leagues on the Pacific Coast will go to work at once and send in liberal subscriptions to Father O'Reilly, so that the cause of Ireland may not be retarded through want of the necessary funds to carry it on to a successful close.

—Non-Catholic journals delight in asserting that a great portion of the crime in this country must be charged to Catholics. This has been proved to be untrue, yet our enemies keep harping upon it without commission, and we are glad, therefore, to be able to show the restraining power of religion over crime by statistics not far from home and which are easily susceptible of proof. Ontario, Canada, is English and Protestant, Quebec is French and Catholic, their respective populations being in the proportion of 24 to 17. The Government Returns give 1,456 as the number of convictions for indictable offences in Ontario for the year 1884; the corresponding number of convictions for Quebec might therefore be calculated as 1,017, it was, however, only 790. When it is borne in mind that in both Provinces the same law is administered by the same authority, these figures show that the moral restraint of Catholic faith is palpably greater than that of Protestantism, especially when it is brought to mind that the power of Protestantism over even the English people, is growing less every day.

—Among the many valuable offerings which the Holy Father received on his Jubilee, not the least interesting was the chasts and elaborately wrought chalice of Australian gold which was forwarded as a gift from the members of the Holy Catholic Guild, New South Wales. It is of purely colonial gold, not less than 17 ct. of the precious metal being used in its making. It stands 11 inches in height, and the cup, which in itself weighs 4 oz., is of plain gold, set in ornamentation of artistic and elaborate workmanship. A jewelled cross is introduced amidst scrolls at the foot of the chalice. The jewels are set in representations of the Southern Cross. The paten weighs nearly 3 oz., and is 5½ inches in diameter. In the making of the chalice the gold has been treated in five different ways namely, deep and bright colored yellow, green and red, and polished, and the consecration of the various shades is highly effective.

—The Ave Maria should be a regular weekly visitor to the homes of Catholics who love to honor the Mother of God. It is the Blessed Virgin's best organ in America, and we fully appreciate the kindness for the eulogistic praises in which it touched its criticism of our Christmas number when it said: "The MONITOR, of San Francisco, published a notable Christmas number. It had two supplements profusely illustrated, and filled with interesting and appropriate articles in prose and verse. The MONITOR is an excellent Catholic journal, and is doing good service on the Pacific coast. We rejoice at its success."

Official Aid to Immorality.

Chief Crowley, head of the police force in this city—who is thoroughly cognizant of the morals which crime is making upon the morality of the youthful both sexes by the numerous dens of immorality which exist in San Francisco—recently asked the Board of Supervisors to pass the following ordinance:

"It shall be unlawful for any person in the city and county of San Francisco to keep or maintain or become an tenant of, or a lessee of, in any manner by sublet, or to the support of, any disorderly house, or house of ill fame, or place for the practice of gambling or lewdness, or to rent, let, or transfer the possession of any premises for use by any person for any of said purposes. Every person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not less than $20 or imprisonment for a term not less than ten days."

The committee of city officials to which this excellent enactment was proposed, took a vote on it and refused to report favorably upon it as that it might become a law, lamen, as we have often said in these columns, it is absolutely useless for a decent people to hope that morality will keep a foothold in this city so long as the hands of those who make the laws are greased with the gold which comes to them through gilded vice.

Every citizen in San Francisco will admit that Chief Crowley's proposition is the very law the city needs, but as some of our Supervisors are elected by the votes of the worst elements in this community, they are the slaves of the slim keepers, and will do nothing that will purify the social atmosphere, for the reason that such men steal political honors through the votes of those from which the city's impurity springs.

Sensible Ideas About Public Schools.

We commend the following sensible paragraph about public schools to the careful perusal of those sectarian cranks and political demagogues who are constantly crying out "Our Public Schools are in Danger" The paragraph comprises a portion of an editorial in the Beacon, of Boston, Mass., and it is scarcely necessary to say that the journal in question is non-Catholic.

"Even the most passionate friend of our public schools should never forget that they are a system of charity, and that the public body has sworn allegiance to primary and grammar schools. These schools are subject to the pleasure of the people, and there is no danger that the public at large, including a majority of the Catholics, are likely to forsake the public school system. It is wholly improbable that the Catholic Church will ever become the enemy of these schools, though for its own children it may prefer parish schools, and that religious instruction which the public school is profoundly unable and unwilling to give. Now, as long as Catholics pay their taxes, as long as they obey the law, as long as they are good American citizens, their right is there to exist, there to plague them, to complain of them and to remind them of Innocent III., who was the lord of the Church of England and of whatever Protestants there was in his day. For the Church of the thirteenth century was the Church of our own ancestors, and is the Church of the present Catholics. But we happen to live in the nineteenth century, in Massachusetts, with freedom of conscience and full freedom of speech. And if any one disputes this freedom, or the freedom to maintain religious schools at our own expense, let him remember that we live in Massachusetts. It is not necessary, even for a Catholic, to agree with Mr. McCarthy. We address and his letter are subject to public discussion and general dissent. But he has a right to speak, and we have a right to speak, and we have a right to speak for the Monitor and the Constitution of Massachusetts and the United States exist for the very purpose of defending this right."

Ireland's Attitude Unchangeable

A great deal has been said recently in the popular press about certain supposed "Planes which England's special friends were supposed to be making with the Sovereign Pontiff in order to keep aliens in Ireland by yielding to the demands of Leagues. Among other "Boots" sixteenth to place the Irish for the loss of their national spirit, we have seen it stated that the Irish in Ireland a Catholic University nicely endowed. But no such bribe will ever tempt the Irish people to exchange in their ancient country National Independence.

A Catholic University once existed in Ireland, and we have of honors in those old days, the Dublin Freeman's Journal, in order that the Eminent Catholics both in England and Ireland, may learn a lesson from their constant when such an Institution existed. The author of the letter is Mr. Charles Dawson, and in it he says

"Of all the dangerous subjects for the Eminent Catholics to touch, that of the Catholic University is the most dangerous. During its long course of struggle this class never gave it a helping hand. I was sure Monsignor Petersi and his Sovereign Pontiff would remember how little it mattered to those people that the University was established by Pope Pius, whose position and Bull founded nearly all the universities in Europe, including those of Oxford and Cambridge. Neither the Pope nor the Bull gave the least heed to these Catholics studiously abstained themselves from the Synod, and the Catholic University, which twenty four Bishops attended. They cannot forget that, they cannot forget that from its walls to those of Trinity and of the Godless colleges. And they had little excuse. Why should the Catholics of Ireland Holy See the University conserved, there was a place in the Catholic Universities in any existing college. Newman was at Dublin, and Ireland produced like Grady, mathematicians like Boyle, literateurs like Ferrand and Allen, chemists like Dr. William K. Sullivan, and Irish Catholics like O'Curry presided in its chairs, but where were the upper class Catholics? Where? They were attending the lectures of Cousin, and the Protestant University. Of this class, as the Newcastleists did in Scotland, they fled to their Parliament and to the See of Peter, the Catholic University, which would have been a great benefit, and dare not have been ignored by the government.

But those persons now no anxious for the amelioration of the Holy See, show their laurels, chief justices, judges and lawyers who would fain go to Rome to instruct the Pope, were exactly where it stated them, and not care one jot either for learning or for religion. And of the few who did go to the University, who were they? Mr. Jake Gibbs, Mr. P. Ry. Mr. Jo Bonny, Mr. D. Dry, Cox and many others who now take the Queen's shilling and the Queen's bread. Nor, it is not likely that the most zealous of modern Pontiffs will be lured walked by such parties. They are sunk in the shadow of the Church crits cause, but not present a strong impression. Their ranks, enrolled for and insulting. When our Lord Cardinal Cullen, Dublin, Ireland, there was then no Parnellism, no National League, no plan of campaign. Yet the upper-class Catholics attend in the Dublin Castle, and the barristers or lawyers wait on the first Prince of the Church every one but Their deportion was conspicuous. Catholics, and the Pope, have been anxious for the recognition and support of a strong Catholic University, for it is causing. In the halls of Trinity College I witnessed the course and the support of scholars like Dr. Haughton, F. T. S. But it is well for all concerned that the Pope's Bull was not, as it really was, the Protestants service. Yet in the history of Ireland, in the Catholic Universities of Ireland, in the Catholic Universities of Ireland, it often seemed another Bull was called for strong enough to overturn his right and the right of anybody to maintain for the Monarchy and the Constitution of Massachusetts and the United States exist for the very purpose of defending this right."

ST. PATRICK'S CHURCH IN ROME.

Consecration Laid Down of St Bridget, Feb. 1st, 1888.

I.

On this feast of the Lily of Eve whose fragrance sweetly blends
With the blood of martyred incense which here to Heaven ascends,
Hail! Lily of Consolation, Lily of the Lamb, Lily of the Cross,
Sweet by the pure waters of Jordan, Lily of the Rose of Sharon,
Zion, Solid the foster hold of Love Jubilee,
Zion Temple, Lily Lady, to Glory St. Patrick's memory.

II.

To Erin's great Apostle, grand founder of the Word,
Who here received consecration, great to make fair Erin Bird,
Bird with the precious gem of Faith planted upon her brow,
Where still continued its trembling image shining brightly now;
Hail! Lily of Consolation, Lily of the Lamb, Lily of the Cross,
Lily, pure as our Queen Mary, fair daughter of the Bride!

III.

Her consecrated sons today around St. Peter's Chair,
Assemble where St. Patrick's knelt, for mission now their own,
To testify their gratitude thus unto God and thee,
St. Patrick, in whose honor, to whose holy memory
The Eternal City will possess a church of the great name
Ireland's Island members young Catholic Ireland
Hail! Lily of Consolation, Lily of the Lamb, Lily of the Cross,
Lily, pure as our Queen Mary, fair daughter of the Bride!

IV.

Atlantic sees the mighty shrine, crown of the Empire State,
While mid Pacific's tiny shrine, Lily of the Golden Gate
Now whole Ethics classic wave receives the Queen Queen
Lily of Virgin Flower on the cross with Lily Lady Queen
Thy patroness dear Erin exhibition her with filial prayer,
Through years from their native isle they still invoke thy care.

V.

And for their fair, dear Motherland long fettered fast in steel,
Crushed by a cruel like tyrant's sight, to thee do they appeal
Lily pure to tender mercy bestow from Zion's sacred shore,
As on consecrated Bridget's Church, Lily Lady, Lily Lady
Sweet Peace and Freedom soon and full of Love may bound
Dear Erin's shore and church were to their ancient Lily Lady.

VI.

St. Patrick and St. Bridget, pour that Erin's dismal sight
May vanish as the golden beams of Freedom's rosiest light,
Be the sacred Lily of Justice shine over Erin's lovely land,
The Harp of Erin's ancient tuner may breathe through the strand
A melody of concord, praise to God in this blessed strain,
Till her children's souls like sweetness, in your celestial fane.

THE ENGLISH MARTYRS.

Complete Official List Taken from Roman Documents.

Following are the names of the two hundred and sixty-one English Martyrs whose canonizations by the Pope will take place in St. Peter's Archdiocese of Westminster, was lately introduced before the Congregation of Rites for further consideration, with a view to their Beatification.

The following Servants of God were declared Venerable:

Anthony Brockby, Franciscan; John Stainsborough, Franciscan; Ven. Ven. Ven.

Farm and Home.

Health Hints.

FROST BITES.—A New Yorker gives the following remedy: Rub the affected parts with goose oil or pure lard. It will also prevent the after effects of chilblains. Care should be taken to amply the parts oil and not the essence of peppermint, as the latter will not have the desired effect.

FEARFUL INFANT MORTALITY.—In Germany goes the astounding result of fifteen infants during the first year of life. Thus nursed by mothers, only 18.7 per cent. lie, those nursed by wet nurses, 29.32 per cent. the, those artificially fed, 50 per cent. those brought up by institutions, 80 per cent. die.

CURE FOR HEADACHE.—Sit erect and in fasts the lan, a fully. Then, stretching the breath, bend slowly forward until the chest meets the knees. After slowly rising again to the erect position, slowly exhale the breath. Repeat this process a second time, and the nerves will be found to have received an excess of energy that will enable them to perform their natural functions.

EARACHES.—Dr. Ayrell, I, ounce; glycerine, 1 grain. Mix and shake well together; then pour twenty-four drops into the ear, and close it up with a piece of raw cotton to exclude the air and retain the mixture. This remedy we can truly say is a specific for earache. It acts promptly and efficiently, and in good hands has never failed to effect a cure in a short space of time.

FRESTED FEET.—Painting it restored by the blood leaving the brain. Place the patient feet and allow the bath to be lower than the body. Sprinkle cold water on the face. Hartshorn may be held near the nose, or to it. A half teaspoonful of aromatic spirits of ammonia in a wineglass of water, will tend to revive the patient. If the symptoms recur send for a physician.

TO CURE STAMMERING.—Dr. Ralph Hindsdon writes, that anyone may cure stammering by simply making an audible note in expiration before each word. Stammerers can sing as easily as other persons. Jacky Brazier, of Chester, who made a large fortune by curing stammering, simply made his pupils say ho! before each word beginning with a consonant.

POISONS.—When a poison has been swallowed, send immediately for a physician, and in the meantime give a tablespoonful of ground mustard in a tumblerful of warm water, followed by more warm water until vomiting occurs. If there is no mustard, common salt will answer. If an alkali like washing soda is taken, give vinegar and water, and follow in a short time with an emetic.

TO ABOLISH A STYE.—Dr. Fitzpatrick says he never saw a single instance in which the stye continued to develop after the following treatment had been used: The lids should be held apart by the thumb and index finger, while tincture of iodine is painted over the inflamed papillæ. The lids should not be allowed to come in contact until the part touched is dry. A few such applications in the twenty-four hours are sufficient.

TO PREVENT CONSTIPATION—Eat brown bread, mush and molasses, or oatmeal porridge for breakfast; use salt water bathing and friction; cold water injections daily, exercise freely in the open air, and last, but not least, the single habit of obeying the voice of nature at a regular hour every day, will cure work wonders, (and I had almost said always), if persevered in. If none of the above remedies succeed, a mild dinner pill may be taken every day, before or after dinner.

Home Cookery.

CORN STARCH CAKE.—One cup of sugar, one and one-fourth cups of flour; beat to a cream; add two eggs, one-half cup of corn starch, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, half a cupful of milk, one teaspoonful of lemon.

EGG SANDWICHES.—Boil fresh eggs five minutes; put them in cold water, and when quite cool peel them, and after taking a little white off each end of the egg, cut the remainder into four slices. Lay them between bread and butter.

GRAHAM MUFFINS.—One quart of Graham flour, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, a piece of butter the size of a walnut, one egg, one teaspoonful of sugar, one half teaspoonful of salt, milk enough to make a batter as thick as for griddle cakes.

CHICKEN STEW.—Boil a chicken until tender, remove and chop fine; have ready a deep dish; put in the pieces of chicken with the liver, in layers, with salt, pepper and butter; make a gravy with the liquor; pour over the chicken and cover with a soft crust.

BROILED CHICKEN.—Split the chicken open on the back and then flatten with a cleaver; lay in a dripping pan with the inside of the chicken next the pan; bake one hour and baste occasionally; when done make a gravy with the giblets and a little butter and browned flour.

MOCK SALMON.—One head of cabbage minced fine to two hard-boiled eggs, to tablespoonfuls of salad oil, two teaspoonfuls of white sugar; one and one-half teaspoonfuls of salt, one teaspoonful of pepper and made mustard, one teaspoonful of vinegar; mix all together thoroughly.

COCOANUT CAKE.—Take an ordinary amount of dough; use cup of desiccated cocoanut; mix thoroughly; bake in three layers. Put together with frosting in which has been mixed one tablespoonful of cocoanut. Frost the cake; sprinkle the top heavily with cocoanut.

CRANBERRY PIE.—For the pastry take one quart of flour, half a pound of lard, half a pound of lard, half a pound of butter, one teacup of cold water. Wash and pick over the berries. Put into a saucepan with a little water, and simmer until they become soft. Bake with a cross-bar of pastry over the top.

Facts for the Farm.

—The price of pedigree shorthorn cattle has dropped in England from an average of $50, which it reached a few years ago, to $27 10s.

—Gopher farming is a new industry begun at Auburndale, Fla. Two men have devoted a tract of 1,000 acres to the purpose. It is said that the most fastidious epicures cannot tell the flesh of the Florida gopher from the famous Maryland terrapin.

—The yield of the corn crop of 1887 in a little more than 200,000,000 bushels short of that of 1886.

—The State of New York feeds and fattens more sheep for the shambles than any of the big sheep raising States.

—There are fifty varieties of cheese imported to this country from Europe. Many of them are imitations made in New Jersey.

—Last year bread and butter cost less than in the previous year, but cheese, pork and canned goods were higher. Coffee, which advanced in price, decreased largely in consumption, while tea, which declined in price, increased 10 per cent in use.

—The annual honey product of North America is about one hundred million pounds, and its value is nearly $12,000,000. The annual wax product is about five hundred thousand pounds, and its value is more than $100,000. There are about three hundred thousand persons keeping bees in North America.

—Scientific tests in Hungary show that corn will yr ders the larger yield of milk, while sorghum will yr ders milk of the richest quality.

Family Fun.

Morning Mysteries.

Oldhand Dame—Hi, you know what time it was when you got in last night!

Tipsy Gent—Nearly one o'clock, I guess. It was after twelve when I got my books balanced. Well, well! This is curious. Here's my hat under the bed, I should have hung it on this chair and it fell down.

"Probably."

"Where are my boots?"

"On the hat rack."

Straightened Out.

Teacher—Correct the sentence, "The liquor which the man brought was drunk."

Smart Boy—The man which bought the liquor was drunk.

Parasites.

A Linguist—Pa, here's a piece in the paper about parasites. What is parasites?

Pa—Parasites, my boy? Why, parasites are the people who live in Paris. I think you ought to know that, and you in the third reader.

No Trouble to Call Again.

Contributor—Here is a lit tle article which I wish to submit to the editorial.

Editor (with a grateful wave of the hand) Very sorry, but we are all full just now.

Contributor—Very well! I will call again when some of you are sober!

True Politeness.

Little Nell—The gentlemen's were rel polite to me in the street car. One real nice one gave me a seat.

Mamma—Indeed!

"Yes, on his knee."

"Oh!"

"Yes, mamma, and some big girls stand up in public real mad cause no one was polite to them."

Knew What He Was Doing.

The congregation of a church at Elk Rock were much at odds upon learning that their preacher had departed under most disreputable circumstances. On the following Sunday it seemed to be the aim of nearly every one to hash up the scandal, and, under great restraint, many uninteresting conversations were had, merely to show that the congregation could rise above sensational gossip. Just before the service were closed Brother Eljah P. Brooks arrose and said.

"Brethren and sisters, since we last met in this home something which seems to have cast a gloom over the congregation has occurred. We were all very much attached to our minister, in fact, we loved him, and I now propose that we offer a prayer for the wanderer."

A sensational wave swept over the congregation. Another brother arose, and turning to Eljah P. Brooks, said

"I am astonished that you should desire this congregation to pray for our erring minister—you above all others."

"Why?"

"Because he ran away with your wife."

"Yes, I know," Eljah replied, "and that is the reason why I think he will need our prayers."

The Cape Cod Oracle.

A few years ago a sage and learned man entered a sage remark. He said: "Thatlarin' ev'ry girl to play the piankur and ev'ry boy to be a bockkeeper will make prairies as a bushel before many years.

In this thoughtful farmer's prediction coming true! And in the reason he gave to his wife why we do not raise potatoes enough for our own people!

Little Laughlets.

Physician (to patient)—Your case is a very serious one, my dear, and I think a consultation had better be held.

Patient (too sick to care for anything)—Very well, Doctor, have as many accomplices as you like.

Countryman (to hotel clerk)—I reckon you'll have to give me another room, mister.

Clerk—What's the matter with the one you have?

Countryman—The sign says, "Don't blow out the gas," an' I gosh, I can't sleep with all that light in the room.

The Binghamton Leader says. It is long year, and it has been just (.00) years since there were as many $'s in the year as we have just now. It is a good time for the old bachelors to negotiate, the girls to reciprocate, and not hesit ate.

"Everything I hear goes in one ear and out the other," said a dude to Charley St. Clair yesterday. "Why shouldn't it?" said Mr. St. Clair, "for there's nothing to stop it."

"It is pretty blue up at the house," said Mr. Twinsey, mournfully; "I've got a cold, my wife's got a cold, baby's got the measles, and my oldest daughter's got a piano. Say, which is the warmest place to stop in?"

Teacher (to naughty boy)—Now, sir, hold out your hand.

Naughty Boy—Look out, ma'am, there's a mouse behind you!

Teacher screams violently and makes a dash for the girl's entry. School adjourns at the boy's entry.

The wild-eyed, long-haired, sombrero-topped man so numerous in Omaha somedays are not cowboys, nor army scouts, nor Indian slayers—unless the lowly redman purchases their wares. They are patent medicine fakers from the Indian-less East.

Physician (to anxious wife)—We have held a consultation, madam, about your husband's case; he is a very sick man, and it might be well to send for a minister, I think.

Anxious Wife—Will one be enough, doctor, or would you advise a consultation of ministers?

An usher at one of our fashionable churches noticed a little tot of a girl walking with the ventilfan until she had half stripped ringing and the services begun. Then he kindly offered to find her a seat. "No, fank 'ou," she said, sweetly, "I want to go home real late and make a thunderstorm like mamma."

An Englishman and a Scotchman were walking in the fields together. "Hilough" said the Englishman, "cows are very wall in thour way. Now in England we feed horses with them." "Ay, ay" said the Scotchman, "and see what fine horses there are in England, and what fine men there are in Scotland."

—Why you gain to done to night, Tonkins? "Wall, Joe Sheppard expects me to spend the evening with him." "Awfully sorry, old man. I was going up to see you to come to my house. "That's all right, my good fellow; I'm not going to disappoint you again. Joe is good for any time. I'll come." Tears was a temporary alance, and the conversation turned upon the weather.

FEAST OF ST. BLAISE.

Spiritual Security against Diphtheria or other Diseases of the Throat.—How the Blessing is Given.

"The Master of Ceremonies of the Archdiocese of Versailles respectfully states to the Sacred Congregation of Rites that in the Blessing of the Throat given on the third of February, only candles that were blessed the day before, the Feast of the Purification, are used:

"1. Is it proper for the priest, when giving this blessing, to use the candles that he holds on his neck, another set held in his hand, as is done in the Archdiocese? The ritual sticks to this used. A candle is held against both cheeks of one of the extremities; then, in giving the blessing, the cross on the end of the stole between the candles is touched to the chin. Or rather, should only the two candles be held by the priest, the lower ends of which, in giving the blessing, are brought together, or nearly so, under the chin?

"2. In the formula for the benediction: Per intercessionem B. V. M. et Beati Blasii martyris liberet te Deus a malo gutturis. Amen; or: Per intercessionem Beati Blasii martyris liberet te Deus a malis gutturis. Amen.

"R. Only one stole, that from his neck, is to be used by the priest in giving the Blessing of St. Blase; and in imparting it he will only say: Per intercessionem Beati Blasii liberet te Deus a malo gutturis. Amen.

March 20, 1869."

The formula for the Blessing of St. Blasius given in the Missa Sancti Blasii of the Roman Ritual recently issued by order of the Sacred Congregation of Rites (Pustet & Co.) is as follows: "Per intercessionem sancti Blasii episcopi et martyris liberet te Deus a malis guttura, cta quibus ista malo. In nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti. Amen."

As this edition of the Ritual was prepared expressly to be the model to which all other editions must conform, and was revised page after page in the Sacred Congregation, there can be no doubt that the form in the Ritual is the one to be used. Every formula given in it must be a basis equivalent to a law decree. In the present case the formula given in the Ritual is the latest, and, therefore, to be followed. Just a glance at the above decree of 1869 will show that the questions to which that decree was a reply had only two things for their object, namely the use of the red stole and the intention of the Blessed Virgin in the formula. Was either, or both, correct? That was the inquiry. Answer.—Neither is correct—the red stole is not to be used, and the intention of the Blessed Virgin is not to be in the formula. The Congregation in replying to the queries from Versailles, did not undertake or intend to give the entire formula to be used. Had such been the intention, the long prayer, Omnipotens et mitissime Deus—the principal part of the formula—would be given.

The title of the blessing in the Ritual is Benedictio Candelarum. It is a special blessing of the candles, in which God is invoked to grant the candles so blessed in honor of St. Blasius, that peculiar virtue whereby the Almighty was pleased to manifest. His acceptance of the saintly life and works of His servant, the Bishop of Sebaste. The candles may be taken home by the faithful and used on occasions serious. The priest's blessing on February 3, attaches to the candle—that all whom thrusts are touched thereunto in pious faith, may be freed, by the merits of his (St. Blasius's) martyrdom from every illness of my kind. The candles once blessed, the intervention of a priest does not seem to be necessary for their after use.

It does not appear that candles other than those blessed on the preceding Feast of the Purification may not be legitimately used. But the candles should be of wax: ceraceus or mixtus cum cera. Candles made of tallow are not allowed. Candles made of wax are not absolutely necessary for the blessing, but the ceremonial adopted by the Sacred Congregation of Rites, and which we have given above, does not allow the use of other than wax candles. The ceremonial adopted in the Archdiocese of Versailles is not that of the Roman Ritual.

MOUNT ST. MARY'S ACADEMY, RENO, NEVADA.

Full Description of the Beautiful Building and its Health-giving Surroundings.

During the Nevada State Fair held in Reno some months ago, the Reno Gazette wrote up and published histories of all the attractive and leading features of the State and Reno, and among those of Reno was one of Mount St. Mary's Academy, which we cheerfully reproduce.

A brief history of this excellent school, the spiritual education and guidance of those who are its pupils, and the marvelous progress made in a very large majority of the readers of the State Fair edition of the Gazette. The Academy is conducted by a community of religious ladies, called Dominican Sisters, who form what is known in the Catholic Church as a Teaching Order. The members who compose these communities devote their lives and talents to the work of Christian education. Those entering the Order, as members, although educated, are subject to a system of training which enables them to keep pace with the most approved methods of teaching.

That they have been eminently successful wherever located as teachers, is evidenced by their growth and flourishing schools on the Pacific Slope and in the Atlantic States. In the interest of Reno it may be said that Mt. St. Mary's Academy stands as one of these many evidences of success. Eleven years ago, Reno, though only partially provided with educational facilities, offered but slight inducements for an addition to the number of schools. The Dominican Sisters, however, on the look-out for new fields of labor, with characteristic foresight, selected Reno as their vantage ground. With them, to decide was to act, and accordingly on the 15th of August, 1887, they arrived in our midst, and rented a suitable building, and, subject to their foundation, opened school in a few days with an attendance of forty day pupils and two boarders. At first quite astonishing the advantages offered by schools of this grade, this may seem a sweeping assertion, but it must be remembered that another Academy had been located in Reno for years, and absolutely many families expecting the efforts of the dull times, had compelled to send their children to the free schools.

In the course of a few months the aspect of things was considerably changed. The number of boarders, day pupils and private music pupils increased so rapidly that the Sisters were obliged to march out for more room and better accommodations, so that in the brief space of three months in Reno they were encouraged to purchase property, and to take measures for the erection of their present large, substantial and well-planned building; but while this new building was but a covered frame, a series of tendernesses and disastrous events occurred that were calculated to cast the gloom and shadows upon the courageous than these enterprising Sisters. Among these was the heavy pecuniary loss entailed by the destructive fire which swept away the greater portion of Reno, and took so much hard, their old convent and school buildings, library, home and school furniture, and all other possessions. The new building escaped the general destruction, but large quantities of valuable goods intended for its completion, were burned. Thus on the 1st day of March, 1887, the Sisters found themselves without accommodation for boarders or day pupils, without capital, and dependent entirely upon their school for support and the means of finishing their house. Notwithstanding these, and other similar drawbacks, these good ladies persevered in their noble work, and the building is now not only an ornament to Reno, but the educational advantages offered compare more than favorably with those of other institutions.

Rt. Rev. Bishop Manogue, ever zealous in the cause of Catholic education, and ever ready to be the prime benefactor of the Academy and has insured the promotion of its object by his timely and tangible aid. The Sisters always speak of this, and of his abiding kindness, and words of fraternal encouragement, in language of commendation and gratitude. The Academy is one of the handsomest and most complete buildings in Reno, occupying grounds—a whole block—within five minutes walk of the railroad depot. The interior of the building commands admiration by the neatness, good taste and good judgment everywhere displayed. The halls, classrooms, dormitories, refectory and recreation hall are all large and well-ventilated. Broad stairways lead down from one to another of the spacious outside porches which run along the west and south sides of the building, affording means of ready escape in case of fire. There is nothing of luxurious in any of the appointments, but much of that rarer elegance which attends neatness and good order in a home-like way. The grounds are spacious and well improved and the lawn of him grass with the broad walks bordered with the tocsan and poplar trees, render this department extremely attractive.

The discipline in the school is mild, but firm, and while no religious influence is ever brought to bear upon the minds of non-Catholic pupils, the polite and moral training of the young ladies is a strong feature in favor of the school, and one to commend it to the 100 fashionable families and guardians who still hold that feminine modesty and reserve are graces that add to, rather than detract from, the wonderful charms of the accomplished young lady. The course of studies pursued in the Academy is similar to that of all first-class Academies. That the pupils at this school are all cared for, well taught, and are happy and contented, may be judged from the fact that they return to the Academy year after year, until they complete the course and depart with graduating honors. Of those who have graduated from the school, a majority have first-grade certificates, and are now actually engaged in the schools in various parts of this State and some in California.

The intrinsic worth of the school, and the increasing demand for its graduates, as teachers, have compelled the Sisters to add to the school and, although still burdened by debts, the projects are that no Institute in Reno will share more largely in this era of prosperity than Mt. St. Mary's Academy.

A PRIEST ON STRIKES.

Their Evil Influence Even upon Catholics.

From the pulpit of St. Mary's Catholic Church, Pittsburgh Pa., Rev. Father Pelt, pastor of the church, has denounced in stringent terms the action of a number of his congregation, who were engaged in the Black Diamond Steel Works strike. The majority of his parishioners are workingmen, and belong to the Knights of Labor. The priest said that a number of members of the church were guilty of using bad language, and warned men who had taken strikers' places in the Black Diamond Works. This was a violation of the laws of the Brotherhood of St. Joseph, a church order to which they all belong. He threatened them with expulsion.

He said that a number of those, who were members of good standing in the church, had called their brothers "Scabs," "Black Sheep," and other harsh names. Many of them were further, cursing and applying vile epithets to them. He called their attention to the order of the Knights of Labor, and asked if the membership in that order warranted such conduct. If it did, they had better leave it at once. He referred to the antipathy between the church and secret societies, and caused a number of prominent church dignitaries who were opposed to the Knights. The members of the church who were the subject of his remarks, were becoming too engrossed in the order, and the time might come when they would have to choose between the Knights of Labor and the church—stick to one and leave the other.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY.

Celebration Benefit for the Youths Directory.

An enthusiastic meeting of the Catholic Young Men's Institute was held in Irish Literary Hall, Sunday afternoon. The following officers were present: President, James E. Kelly; Vice President, M. H. Dwyer; Second Vice President, Captain M. J. Wallace; Recording Secretary, Thomas F. Boyle; Corresponding Secretary, Thomas J. Ryan; Treasurer, Thomas F. Boyle; Marshal, Captain M. J. Wallace; Sentinel, J. Mc. Gillen; President Hibernian Benevolent Society, Thomas J. Ryan; President Young Men's Institute, James E. Kelly.

A full Irish band, J. Mc. Gillen, President Hibernian Benevolent Society, Thomas J. Ryan, and President Young Men's Institute, James E. Kelly, addressed the meeting.

Arrangements were made for a grand ball in aid of the Youths' Directory, to be held in Irish Literary Hall, on the 17th of March, St. Patrick's Day. The committee reported that the Hibernian Society had agreed to take the ball tickets for the benefit of the Institute. The recommendation was adopted.

The following were elected delegates at large to the convention: C. D. O'Sullivan, Mark J. Sullivan, William F. Welch, J. J. Quinn, J. B. McGinty, Henry Barrett, Thomas Fitzpatrick, George D. B. Hayes, Joseph I. Dooly, John J. Mc. Hale, J. F. Dugan, William F. Stafford, J. M. Kinge, G. W. Paterson, Jeremiah Deasy and Mr. Shilling.

Messrs McCrystal, Sheehan, and Wine were appointed with Mr. James E. Kelly of his ex-officio President.

Messrs. Barnes, Dowling, Kenny, McCarty, Sullivan and Scanlan, with the Chairman, were appointed a ball committee.

The committee called upon to address the convention, and to pass an account of the action of Irish branches for the amusement of the possible resin, described an election scene, and the Irish Literary Society, of which he was President in San Francisco. The convention then adjourned.

[FOR THE MONITOR.]

THE HOLY SEASON OF LENT.

Cast off, ye sons of fallen man, your pall
Of empty pleasures and dark sin!
Repent from sinful thoughts that blind the mind,
For now the solemn days begin.
The awful days, when, age past, our God
Is deep and piercing suffering blind;
And mourned His thousand agonies intense,
By being numbered with the dead.
Ah, think for what a thankless race He died,
Rejoice! the hours are and nearly hence;
Oh! thank Him for His dying thus that saved
Mankind from burning hell and woe.
Now as this chilly month of winter dear,
He ushered in the silent Lent,
Open your wide the windows of your hearts,
And take the groom He has sent.
Now unto God, the front of purest lilies,
Let hers and heavenly serene turn;
And in the mystic chamber of the soul,
Let penance from day dwelling be.
Aye, let them burn, this season wisely made,
In penance free and humblest prayer;
Let God adored at the sepulchral aisle
Shine forth in Victor's parenthesis fair,
Full long in ashes sin's mysterious way,
Have we in misty darkness trod;
Tis now the time to shun our thoughtless path,
And turn with heartfelt love to God.
Oh! if from Satan's wiles we owned free
To seek our creeder's holy light,
The soul in innocence resplendent shall
Shall bask in the glory of God's right.
With truth reflect, that this temptsome world
Is but a Lent of sorrow great—
A short-end step where man his part must act,
To pass through Heaven's pearly gate.
Yes our ashes in the mantle of vile dirt;
To God, our souls in sorrow bare;
Tis Lent, the solemn moment of the year,
When "Mercy most delights to spare."

DEATH OF THE CROSS.

High hung on hurtling cross, a bleeding One—
The Saviour of the mighty world appears,
Bearing the sin-weight of Time's long years,
And heaves, the destined goal for man, His woe,
Redemption's task and suffering thus were done.
The sin-laden's world at Saviour's death did seem
To a sparrow rise as from a troubled dream,
With lend sprear and gimmes form. The sun,
Shaded a delight or shrouds, in sager rushed
To hide its fiery light. A host of cloods
Dark frown upon the earth. The air was hushed.
The earth seemed wrapped in thrice-fold sable shrouds,
As if intent to be Death's regal bride.
Thus Nature trembling spoke when J'sus' died.

HARKEN TO THEE.

Nearer to Mary! Yes, when we are tempted,
Near the dark whelpings of sin or of shame,
If we implore thy maternal protection—
Breathe thy name and blessed, I am calmie name—
Thou in Bible scenes with mystical splendor
Bless the beautiful Star of the Sea,
Shining above us and guiding us gently
Nearer and nearer, I feel Mother, to thee.

Nearer to Mary! Yes, when in affliction,
Weeping and kneeling before thy dear shrine,
If we remember thy sorrows and sufferings
Think of the anguish of heart that was thine—
Thine, our mother, our Mother, to thee.

Nearer and nearer—but, in our last moments,
When a strange darkness more over the soul,
Comfort us then, Blessed Mother of Sorrows,
Pray for us then, most compassionate Queen.
Nearer to Mary! Yes, blissful assurance!
Weary, unhappy and poor though we be,
Still we may trustay that in the bright future
We may forever be nearer to thee!

THE QUEEN OF WOMEN.

O, under the cottage roof!
Or, under the palace dome!
Here's to the Queen of Women,
The woman who loves her home!
Finds it a little kingdom,
In which she can always stay,
Making it better and fairer
And happier every day.

Here's to the Queen of Women:
The faithful and tender wife!
The strength of her husband's heart,
The joy of her husband's life.
Other joys know than?
Lighter love comes to an end;
The true wife is always a queen!
Comforter! Counselor! Friend!

Here's to the Queen of Women!
The Mother content to be
Mother and nurse and teacher
To the children at her knee.
She is the woman to place
All other women above;
She is the woman to praise:
She is the woman to love!

What is a sceptre and crown,
Crown and sceptre of gold!
Ermine and velvet and silk
Fallow in many a fold?
Greater the mother and wife,
Edgeing in love sweet,
Over her husband and home!
Twenty times greater a queen!

Beauty and youth will not last;
Fashion may make themselves wings;
Pleasure and fashion too oft
Are unconsiderately kings.
The beauty, the lotrous, the belle,
Alike upon love must bear;
Only the wife and the mother
Is always and ever a queen!

PETER'S POWER.

"Blessed art thou!" the Saviour said,
As Peter's answer came
With sufficient love: "Thou art the Christ,
Son of the living God!"
For flesh and blood had not revealed
The truth that Peter spoke;
But Heaven's light that ever walls
The Father's mighty will.

Amazed and mute the others stood
To hear their leader praised;
Each throbbing heart with awe was lettered
As Peter further said:
"I say to you: then Peter art,
And on this rock,—Peter—
My Church I'll build, and 'gainst it not Shall gates of hell prevail."

"Of Heaven's Kingdom," He did add,
"I'll give to thee keys!
And whatsoever that thou shalt bind
Upon the earth Hell,
The same in Heaven bound shall be;
And whatsoever, also,
"Upon the earth thou loosest shalt, Shall loosed in Heaven be!"

Guy Traynor's Probation.

A Love Story Founded on Fact.

BY CHARLES HERBERT.

CHAPTER I.

"Whom can it be from?" said Archibald Wellington, the retired London draper, as he scanned the address of a letter which he had just received.

He was seated in his easy armchair, in the morning room, after breakfast; and his question was uttered in a half soliloquising tone, although, as he spoke, he glanced at his only child, a pretty girl of eighteen, who was sitting near him, and who was engaged in some fancy needlework.

"I don't know the handwriting," he went on; examining the superscription closely through his spectacles. "Certainly, I never saw it before."

"Don't you think you had better open it, father?" suggested Edith, in a voice which betrayed some impatience.

"Yes, yes, my dear," said Mr. Wellington, absentedly staring at the envelope.

Tearing open the cover, he took out the letter and looked at the signature.

"Guy Traynor!" he exclaimed. "What can he be writing to me about, I wonder!"

A strange light came into the young girl's eyes.

"Read it, father, and we shall then know!" she ventured, with an arch smile.

"Sir, the old gentleman slowly began, "you will doubtless be surprised on receiving this. What a hand he writes! Positively copperplate! He ought to be a bookkeeper in a large establishment, let me see; where was I? 'On receiving this, and perhaps you will be inclined to consider the request I am about to make to you an act of presumption. But even a refusal will be better than the present suspense, and I can control my feelings no longer.' I have not the remotest idea of what he means—

"Read on, father, and you will see," returned Edith.

"Of course," said her father, bending over the letter again. "'To come to the point at once, I have your daughter Edith, and have reason to believe that the attachment is reciprocal.'

"Edith!" exclaimed Mr. Wellington, with a frown "is this a joke, or is the young fellow in earnest?"

"It is no joke at all, father; Mr. Traynor is quite serious."

"What! Has he the audacity to love you, and the presumption to think that—"

"I love him in return," added Edith quietly. "Yes, it is true, and he is only awaiting your consent to our marriage."

"How do you know that?"

"Because he told me yesterday that he intended to ask you for it."

"Indeed! Then you may tell him that I distinctly refuse to hear another word from him on the subject. A young fellow without a shilling."

"That is no fault of his," remonstrated Edith. "Besides, if he has no fortune, he is bound to make one, you have said so yourself."

"Yes; I have often heard you compliment him on his literary attainments, and say that he was certain to make his way in the world.

"If I did, it does not follow that I should choose him for a son-in-law. If he had only something in hand to begin with."

"That is just what he was coming to," said Edith. "The end of his letter explains it."

"Let me read the end, then," replied Mr. Wellington in a half-amused, half-angry tone, taking the letter as he spoke, "I may as well know it too.

"'My sole object in life,' he read, "is to be the husband of Edith Wellington, but I do not aspire to occupy that position until I am able to offer her a home in some degree worthy of her. To the accomplishment of my ambition I have firmly pledged myself henceforth be devoted: and I am confident of success. One year's probation is all I ask. At its expiration I pledge myself either to bring you the sum of a thousand pounds as an earnest of what I hope to do in the future, or at once to renounce all claim to your daughter's hand. Hin." concluded Mr. Wellington, "a thousand pounds is not a big amount, but the lad, I must admit, speaks fairly enough."

"You will be fully convinced of the honesty of his declaration after you have heard him speak himself."

"I do not quite catch your meaning, Edith."

"He is coming to see you this morning. He is not far off at this moment."

"How do you know that?"

"Because it has just struck nine, and at that hour he told me he would be in the street opposite our house."

Without waiting to hear what her father had to say, she opened the window and made a sign, which was evidently expected, for a minute or two later the servant announced "Mr. Guy Traynor."

On his visitor's entrance, Mr. Wellington put on a magisterial air. Its acknowledged the young man's respectful salutation by a patronizing wave of the hand.

"Sit down, Mr. Traynor," he began, affecting a dignified ease, but in reality he was hardly less embarrassed than the individual he addressed. "I have read your letter—I must congratulate you on your fine handwriting—and I gather from it that you are—shall we say—desirous of obtaining my consent to your marriage with my daughter."

Guy bowed assent.

"It is my fondest hope," he declared.

"I will not deny," pursued the retired merchant, "that I had other views—financially more advantageous—for her. But under the circumstances—how he had features relaxed—"I might be disposed to waive my objections and accept your conditions, if I saw any reasonable chance of your fulfilling them."

"I assure you," said Guy, "that—

"Pardon me," interrupted Mr. Wellington, "but I must ask you a few questions. May I inquire what are your present means of existence?"

"My salary, sir, as clerk in this Post Office, is thirty-seven shillings and sixpence per week."

"Enough! Other resources?"

"No. My earnings have hitherto sufficed for my wants, and I have even put by twenty or thirty pounds out of them. Henceforth it will be different. I shall resign my situation to-day, and depend upon my own exertions."

"They may possibly bring you in loss," said Mr. Wellington, with an ominous shake of the head. "And what are your prospects for the future?"

"I mean to utilize the excellent education I have received, and turn my pen to account. I am well acquainted with the principal modern languages, and speak them tolerably fluency. The classics have always been my favorite study, and in my leisure hours I have acquired some proficiency in the Oriental tongues. Besides, I have a natural taste for painting, and have even dabbled in chemistry. With so many chances in my favor, one at least ought to serve my turn.

"I hope it may," rejoined Mr. Wellington; "but in my business a thousand pounds was not so easily gained. However, it rests with you to succeed or fail. To-day is the 14th of September, 1885. On this day next year, if you have kept your word, you will have earned your prize.

"You believe in me still, Miss Wellington?" said Guy Traynor, with a pitying glance at Edith.

"With all my heart, and forever," was her reply.

CHAPTER II.

[illegible] alone, a young man, the occupant of a miserable attic in the Leopoldstadt, the poorest quarter in Vienna, was sitting on a wooden bench at a rickety deal table, on which lay an unfinished letter.

His pale, care-worn features bore the unmistakable marks of suffering and privation, and he looked deeply as he threw down his pen.

"I cannot do it," he muttered, in a voice broken by emotion. "The task is too hard, too cruel. And yet I must release her from this fatal engagement, which I once thought by hoped would be a source of happiness to both. Those who have wrongled us I have can alone know what it has cost me to bear my lot patiently. Hitherto I have kept up, and still despairing, close to the delusive vision conjured up by a disordered imagination. A few more weeks will tell the tale, and they must be written.

With a look of anguish he read over the beginning of his letter, and he had already taken up his pen yet to continue it, when the door opened gently and a stoutish personage with Israelitish cast of countenance entered the room.

"Herr Traynor, and the newcomer in German, "pardon the intrusion. Not having met you for some days, I was afraid you might be ill, and I thought I would call to ask if any service. You work too hard, my friend you overtax your strength. Take a doctor's advice, and come with me. We shall dine together, and a stroll in the Prater will do you no harm."

"You are very kind, Herr Rieger," replied Traynor, with a faint smile; "but I feel so weak and disjointed that—"

"Not another word," exclaimed the visitor, as a sudden thought struck him. "You have been sitting too long."

Guy bid his face in his hands.

"Not yesterday," he faltered.

"Not yesterday! Why, you don't mean to say that—

"That at least can be remedied," said the doctor, "and the sooner the better. Put on your hat and come. When we have dined, you shall tell me your story."

A comfortable repast in an adjoining restaurant, and a glass or two of sparkling Hungarian wine, especially recommended by Herr Rieger, being somewhat invigorated his companion, the former handed a cigar to his guest, and lighted another for himself. "Now, said the doctor, "let us talk seriously. Since I first had the pleasure of making your acquaintance in the bookseller's shop near the Graben, I have often wondered that with your abilities you have not succeeded in turning them to some account.

"The usual ill luck, I suppose," replied Traynor, "that a literary man and an artist—and unfortunately for me I am both—must expect when he has neither money nor influence to back him. I have tried every thing in vain. Publishers will not even either declined to look at my manuscripts, or pronounced them unsuitable. Managers and art patrons gave me a commission that I should be able to finish in a month's time, for a Madonna for the Louvre, and after nearly a year's hard labor he handed me the miserable sum of £20. At last, despairing of success in London, I tried Paris. There I met with a friend. Then I came to Vienna, hoping to find an old friend, a Viennese by birth, whom I had lost sight for many years, and who would certainly have aided me by every means in his power. I was too late. He died a few months before I came, and they threw weeks had passed before his patient was out of danger. The nurses, however, kept me ignorant of his grand strength rapidly; and, buoyed up by the cheering prospect of speedily resuming his fondest hopes, impatiently counted the days which must elapse before I could go to him.

"How can I sufficiently thank you, doctor, for all the kindness I have received at your hands" he said one evening to his friend, the latter was busily superintending the preparations for the invalid's supper.

"By getting well as soon as possible, replied the doctor, laughing. "I only refer to thank you, for it is a glorious feather in my cap. I shall be proud of my patient."

Two days before the departure of our hero from Vienna, a general meeting of the numerous friends he had made was convened in his honor and the sum of ten thousand florins was duly collected, together with a voluminous diploma, was formally delivered to him.

Professor Langenhart treated the assembly to a long discourse on the peculiar merits of the pigeon considered as an article of food, and concluded by proposing three hearty cheers, that Herr Traynor should be elected as an honorary member of the society.

On the 15th of September, 1884, Guy Traynor appeared in London, and next morning, as time o'clock struck, appeared at the Post Office, where he was met by a gentleman and his daughter sitting in the waiting room, who left them a year previously.

"Well, well," exclaimed the old gentleman, "I really thought you would be late, sir!"

"I told you he would, all along, father," said Edith glancing fondly at her lover, "I was sure of it, but I think he might have written."

"Leave me!" her father went on, struck with the young man's pale haggard face, "you look as if you need a rest. You have been working too hard."

"But to some purpose," answered Traynor, drawing from his pocket-book a bank-notes from the money changers, and laying them on the table. "I am, I have kept my word."

"And I said the old merchant, when he had carefully counted the notes, "will keep mine. Edith is yours. But alone I can part altogether with my little girl so most made room for you here. As it happens, I am a little lame in the side of trade. My successor in the business is looking out for a partner, and with a thousand pounds, and so much again from my son, there will be a fine opening for a young married man. What do you say?

"That I am the happiest of men," cried Traynor, grasping the hand of his future father-in-law.

"You seem to have suffered much, Guy," whispered Edith. "Do you regret your long absence from home?"

"Regret it, darling, when it has given you to me," responded Guy, "Oh, I added seriously, with a slight shudder, "I do not think that I could go through another ordeal of the kind, even for such a prize, and he glanced tenderly down into her beaming eyes.

SEND US CATHOLIC NEWS.

We would most respectfully ask the Rev. Clergy, and any other friends of the Catholic Church, to send us local items of general interest. We wish to make the MONITOR a chronicle of all Catholic happenings relating to the progress of religion. We know that there are many who by those who have the knowledge of the facts in their keeping. Dare facts are all we want. Will our friends please furnish us with them?

CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY.

Important Steps Being Taken for Its Early Institution.

A meeting of prominent Catholic gentlemen took place in Maryland Hall, on Holliday street, Baltimore, on Tuesday morning, January 24th, for the purpose of considering the progress of the proposed Catholic University, and for taking steps to further its interests. The gentlemen at the meeting was presided over by His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons, and was addressed by the Right Rev. Bishop Keane, of Richmond, the Rector, who explained the objects and purposes of the University.

Tuesday evening, January 17, a meeting was held in Unitarian Hall for the same purpose. The meeting was a second, and the enthusiastic reception given to its advocates afords these satisfactory evidence that the University will be sustained by the Catholics of this country. There were members of Young Catholic Friend Society had charge of the meeting. The platform were seated Cardinal Gibbons, who acted as chairman, Bishop Keane, and Rev. Fathers Foley, Clarke, Ryan, Donahoe, Dubuc, Lee, with Rev. Walter J. Dupuy, of Albany Cathedral, and others. After a short prayer by the Cardinal, the Rector read several addresses from Bishop Ireland, who had been delayed two hours at Harrisburg, he would probably arrive in the next hour. He had the arrangements that time and was unknown to the gathering. Bishop Keane, who was speaking when Bishop Ireland came on the floor for the university, who also received an endorse from the Cardinal. Bishop Ireland's speech was warmly applauded and received the cordial support of Rome to be characterized as the arrival of a blessed from America. Bishop Ireland said he was sorry he had been late, but he was glad to welcome a blessed as he was then. He was glad to hear the remarks Bishop Keane and we, Bishop Ireland had contributed $1000, and he would be an enthusiast in the university, and he would be willing to endow a chair in the Catholic University, and he would be willing to give all the assistance in his power, and he would be willing to give all the assistance in his power, and he would be willing to give all the assistance in his power

EDITORIAL NOTES.

—Next Monday will be the tenth anniversary of the election of Pope Leo XIII. Long may he reign!

—The Jubilee offering of the Jesuit Fathers to Pope Leo XIII., comprised $200,000 in gold, besides an immense variety of objects of art, literature and ecclesiastical usefulness.

—In the London Evening Star (T. P. O'Connor's paper), Mr. Healy asks the pertinent question whether the Queen would be more dishonored by having men like John Dillon and Justin McCarthy to advise her in Dublin than she would be by such men as French and Cornwall.

—The impressment of priests goes on in Ireland, but it only adds fresh fuel to the fire of patriotism that burns so brightly in every Irishman's breast. Great times require great sacrifices, and this is not the first time in Irish history when Irish priests became martyrs for Ireland's sake.

—James G. Blaine has written a letter declining to be a candidate for the Presidency. Now that he is out of politics and in the vicinity of the Chair of Peter, we sincerely hope he may have the grace to erase his baptismal vows and to return to the Church of God and of his good mother Gillespie.

—In addition to the favorable rep rts concerning the attendance of Irish Bishops at the Plenary Council, which we published last week, we have now the gratification of telling our readers that Judge Kinby opened the Quarter Sessions in Armagh on Jan. 19th, and there was only one bill of a very trifling nature, so the Judge congratulated the Grand Jury on the peaceful state of the county.

—A cablegram from Rome says that some of the jubilee orators on exhibition in Rome have been stolen, but the cable from Rome has been so laden with lies recently that we give but little credence to its report. If true, however, it only shows that human depravity which begun with the Reformation has been fast going down the sliding scale of Satan ever since.

—Not much has been said in the papers recently about Ireland's gifted patriot Thos. Sexton, whose critical condition we noted a few weeks ago. A Dublin correspondent informs us that a bulletin was issued recently by Drs. Banks, MacDonnell and Kenny, as follows: "Mr. Sexton is making satisfactory progress. Fresh air seems for some months are essential for his complete restoration to health." It is very likely that Mr. Sexton will—

—To-day begins the Holy Season of Lent, and just as most of the hampering restrictions and religious devotions, by a decree from Rome the Regulations for Lent are now uniform throughout every Diocese in the United States, so that Catholics travelling from one section of the country to other need not hereafter have to enquire what privileges are prescribed or prohibited in different localities. The desirable change was brought about by the Prelates of the Third Plenary Council, for which the faithful should thank them with prayers.

—Some significant facts regarding mixed marriages are collected by a Polish Catholic paper, the Kuyer Poznanski. The percentage of mixed marriages to the total number rose from 14.02 in the Province of Posen, to 17.27 in that of West Prussia, and to 26.99 in Silesia. It is clear, therefore, that the proportion increases as the provinces become more "Germanized," and lose more of their national language, manners and surroundings. But what is most alarming of all is that lists hour out that generally in the second generation, and always in the third generation, the children of mixed marriages become Protestants.

—A Catholic paper in Liverpool says: "We have much pleasure in recording another clerical conversion. The Rev. C. E. Gandy, late curate of St. Michael's, Edinburgh, and formerly of St. James, Hyde-mouth, and St. Mary Magdalene, Lammemoor, was received into the Church, at St. Mary's, Clapham, by Rev. Father Bridgett, C. SS. R., on the 11th inst. Next morning Mr. Gandy received his First Communion from the hands of his old friend, Rev. Father Langdale, of Lanscoton, who was also formerly a Protestant clergyman. Mr. Gandy is about to commence his studies for the priesthood." A converted Anglican preacher, giving First Communion to a brother convert, was a sight to make even angels rejoice!

—Cardinal Manning has publicly disowned having any literary connection or personal sympathy with the anti-Irish sentiments of the London Tablet. He says he is neither directly nor indirectly responsible for the Tablet newspaper. This is certainly hard upon the English Catholic Tories who have done all they could to make it general; by believing that the Cardinal is on their side and opposed to the claims of Ireland. Cardinal Manning is one of the few English Catholics of position and importance who has risen above the selfish views and prejudices of English Catholicism, and it is well known in Vatican circles that he is one of the staunchest upholders of the Irish cause and of the claims of a people whose hopes depend on their unswerving fidelity to Faith and Fatherland.

—The Rome correspondent of the Dublin Nation writes as follows concerning the attitude of the Irish Question before the Vatican: "A special telegram from Rome announces that several American Bishops have been received in special audience by his Holiness. The Prelates, as are told, used on the occasion every possible argument to dissuade the Pontiff from condemning the national agitation. From these and other indications we may conclude that the National League is not likely to condemned by the ban of the Church. If the Duke of Norfolk fancies that he can induce Leo XIII. to level his thunderbolt at the legitimate aspirations of the Irish people, he will find to his disgust that he has to deal with a pontiff of a mind bordering on dotrediling sleep. Those who would have the Holy Father lend his shoulder to Balfour's Juggernaut, and who would ask the Vicar of Christ to countenance the ignoble programme and policy of Dublin Castle, are guilty of a gross breach of decorum in his regard. Howard's mission will turn out to be as big a farce as that of George Errington. And the sooner the epilogue comes the better.

—The demoralizing influences of Mormonism are by no means confined to Utah. In fact so common has the custom of supporting a plurality of wives become in the land of the Puritans, the New York Sun boldly asserts that "there are more men in New England who have several living wives than there are in Utah." Nor is the evil confined to New England as the following example from a Western city amply proves. Not many days since, at St. Paul, Minn., Mrs. John Wilkins filed suit for divorce against her husband, alleging that he had said lately had five wives, all living in St. Paul. He married the complainant, an attractive brunette, in Pennsylvania fifteen years ago. They lived happily until they came to St. Paul fifteen years ago, but here he began his polygamous exploits, carrying on rapid excursions, Simon Stylites, West Point, Miss French and Hattie Bowles, each under an assumed name. The strain of keeping up five separate establishments proved too much for him and he has at length got himself into the toeiles of the law. Such is the condition of society under the Protestant system of divorce—one of the worst systems of human degradation ever invented by a diabolical agency.

—The announcement by telegram some weeks ago that twenty Christian churches had been destroyed and Christians massacred in Foshien province, China, was alarming. Recent dispatches state that the places of worship destroyed were Roman Catholic. It is very obvious that a Protestant mission is molested.—Pacific Christian Advocate.

True, indeed, Brother McCrary. Protestant missions are rarely molested, for the reason that the same evil spirit in man that hated the Son of God still hates His holy Church. Protestantism is of this world and—as St. John says—"the world lieth in wickedness," hence the immunity of Protestant missions from molestation. Nor are Protestant preachers ever martyred, and this for divers reasons. In the first place they act on the Hudibrasian truism by keeping away from danger and dangling on their wives skirts during their ignominious retreat. Protestant preachers in China are merely paid hirelings, and Protestantism is not planted in China to get them. Next week we will write some facts regarding the double-dealing and cowardice of the Protestant preachers in China to get them.

Speaking on the Nature of the Church at the Pro-Cathedral, on a recent Sunday morning, Cardinal Manning said:

"True it is hardly a heresy that has ever been taught in the world that was not begun by a priest or a bishop. One or two heresies certainly owe their origin to laymen, but the great multitude of Heresiarchs have been priests and bishops. They separated themselves from the Truth, and got others to follow them; as Satan fell from Heaven and drew down with him a multitude of angels. . . . But every separation that has been made from the Church has withered and passed away. . . . Where are the separations of the ancient world? They are gone. Even their names are not known. Where are the separations of the middle ages? You don't even know the titles that they bore. Where are the separations of the last centuries? Gone fast, and shame are the kingdoms of the world! They have passed away. And the Emperors of the world! They have succeeded one another, and are not. And the Kingdom of Christ was the Roman Empire, and then came the Franco-Empire, and it was followed by a German Empire. Where are they? And now we have a Hierodotisany Europe. And where will that be? In the midst of the dead the Church stands, the Body united to the Head, inhabited by the Holy Spirit, the Lord and Giver of life, shelled in all its ancient beauty, unpolluted, indissoluble, unconquerable, fulfilling the prophecy that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."

Death of Archbishop Lamy.

A telegram from Santa Fe, New Mexico, conveys the sad intelligence that the venerable Archbishop Lamy, the pioneer Prelate of that portion of the continent, died on last Sunday morning. In the Monitor of January 19th last we gave a biographical sketch of the lamented Prelate, and we have now only to request the prayers of the Catholic faithful for the repose of his soul. The telegram states that the deceased Prelate's death was very quiet and painless. He had been suffering for some weeks from a second attack of pneumonia, and had not strength left to rally from its effects. Archbishop Lamy's remains will be laid in the Cathedral in Santa Fe until Thursday or Friday, when the funeral will take place. Illness crowns is felt throughout the Southwest, the Bishop being widely known and loved by all. R. I. P.

Next Sunday's Collection.

In accordance with the Circular issued by his Grace Archbishop Riordan, and published in the Monitor last week, the collection taken up in all the churches throughout the Archdiocese on next Sunday, will be for the organization and support of Missions among the Colored people of the Southern States and also the remnants of the Indian tribes who have survived the injustice with which they have been treated.

No Priests in any Protestant Sect

We notice in the daily papers of last Thursday a gleaming account of what is erroneously called "the ordination of three priests" by some "Bishops" of the Protestant Episcopal Sect. This so-called "ordination" is all alone, and those so-called "Bishops" unassuming in mildness, are merely sectarian preachers whose ordained brethren stand on the outside of innumerable others throughout the country who are kept by the daily press to exhibit Error as Truth, and to present sectarian sham ministrations as Christian worship. The Episcopal Church contains which elevate laymen into the high and holy office of the true Priesthood as it exists in the Catholic Church alone.

Give Good Example.

Catholics, says a contemporary more than any others in every community, should be models of virtue for their fellow-men. God has given to us graces which non-Catholics can never possess. He has provided Sacraments by which we may be purified, strengthened and rendered sinless in the sight of God. He has given us heavenly admonitors who pray before His throne, so that a wise community walk in the path that leads to eternal bliss. But unfortunately for themselves, there are Catholics who seem to be ignorant of the Sacraments, who never petition the Mother of God or the Saints to intercede for them, and thus they fall through ignorance into the gulf of the Sin died for into the mire of their own iniquities. Such Catholics authour it is who light the fire of prejudice in non-Catholic minds against our Holy Church, and who follow it in the mock and humble manner so fitting to our Blessed Redeemer.

The Church in China.

It is interesting to note the growth of Catholicity in the East during the short space of one year. Comparing the statistics published in the Missions Catholiques for 1886 and 1887, we find that in the former year China numbered 483,403 Catholics, 2,429 churches or chapels, 471 European missionaries and 251 native priests, while in the latter year there were 494,552 Catholics, 2,500 churches or chapels, 477 European missionaries and 253 native priests. Farm and Home.

Health Hints.

PILES.—The following ointment will ease a most cases of piles, even those that will seem to require an operation. I have never found it necessary to operate since I became familiar with the theory. A number of cases of chronic prolapsus have yielded to it. Monsilin's salt, one half ounce; phenic acid, six grains; petroleum wax, 1 ounce. Apply and manipulate with finger. Be sure to use petroleum wax; lard, vaseline, oxonoline, etc., should not be substituted, as the oxide petrolatum has a specific effect on the parts diseased.

INGROWNE NAIL.—M. Monod states that during the last twenty years he has treated ingrowing nail by a very simple and efficient manner, which does not involve the removal of the nail. He makes a less application of nitrate of silver at the commencement of the affection, without isolating the nail. If the cauterization is carried into the diseased tissue, the patient has usually, even by the next day, derived considerable relief, and is able to walk in moderation with an easy shoe. Extirpation of the nail seldom is required for quite exceptional cases.

TRUTHS.—When new-born children, affected with thrush, refuse to take the breast or bottle, Dr. Wunderlicher advises the pouring of milk by means of a funnel through the nasal loom. This mode of alimentation is not difficult. When the milk enters the pharynx it provokes reflex movements of deglutition, and is propelled into the stomach. The author has been enabled by this means to nourish infants for three or four weeks in succession. The same procedure is useful in children born before term, in whom there is no sucking movements of deglutition.

TO REMOVE HEADACHE.—As this is usually a symptom of some form of dyspepsia, to prevent it permanently, it will be necessary to cure the disease. But great temporary relief may generally be obtained from the use of antacids, such as magnesia, lime water, etc. The great thing is to prevent it, by the use of a proper diet. Dispose of pastry as you would if you knew it to be half arsenic. Let others eat all the sweet things. Take a large proportion of animal food, though not salt or smoked meats. Salt and water, or vinegar and salt, over the stomach and bowels, with plenty of friction should never be forgotten.

BED-SORES.—The patient being often obliged to lie in one position, bed-sores occur, being due to long-continued pressure on parts whose general vitality is weakened. They usually form at the lower end of the backbone. Much can be done to prevent them by keeping the sacral sheet perfectly smooth, clean and dry. Pressure on any one point may be avoided by changing the position frequently. The parts of the body resting most heavily on the bed, when the skin is not broken, should be sponged three or four times daily with alcohol or whisky and water. Air cushions are made use of to remove all pressure from the lower end of the back bone, are useful.

Family Cookery.

CRANBERRY PIE.—Put up one pint and one quart of flour, half pound of lard, half pound of butter, one teacup of cold water. Make into a paste, line the pie dish with one-half the paste, fill with cranberries, sprinkle plenty of sugar over the top.

CURRANT DRINKS.—Cut a chicken into pieces, season and fry in butter. Slice an onion and fry in butter, add a teacupful of stock, and tablespoonful of curry powder mixed with a little flour, and rubbed smooth with a little stock; salt; boil five minutes.

ENGLISH PLUM PUDDING.—One cup of sweet milk, one cup of molasses, two cups stoned raisins or currants, three cups of sifted flour, one cup "bread" (sifted in taking one teaspoonful of soda, and salt; steam three hours; serve hot, with sauce.

LEMON FOAM.—Beat well together the yolks of six eggs, half pound of powdered sugar, two grated lemons, half ounce of gelatine dissolved in cold water. Simmer over the fire until quite thick. Beat the whites of the eggs to a stiff froth, add them to the mixture; beat together and pour into moulds.

DELICATE INDIAN PUDDING.—One quart of milk scalded, two heaping tablespoonfuls of meal, cook twelve minutes; stir into this one tablespoonful of butter, then beat three eggs with four tablespoonfuls of sugar, one half tablespoonful of ginger, salt to taste, mix all thoroughly, and bake one hour.

SPICE MIXED.—From kerosene lamps may be removed from the ceiling by washing with strong soda water, and the yellow stains from leaks with a strong solution of white vitriol at least, so an old oilcloth and painter tells me.

PUTATOES A LA CREME.—Put into a saucepan three tablespoonfuls of butter, a little chopped parsley, salt and pepper to taste. Stir up well until hot, add a small teacupful of cream, thicken with two tablespoonfuls of flour, and stir until it boils. Chop some cold boiled potatoes, put into the mixture and boil up once.

INK STAINED CARPETS.—I have removed the very worst ink stains from carpets of very delicate colors by rubbing them with skim milk and when they are almost dried, washing them with a cloth wrung out in boiling water without soap. Then cover the place with a dry cloth and let it remain an hour dry.

Increase of Heart Disease.

It is an alarming fact which has been brought to the attention of physicians in this city in recent years that deaths from heart disease are six to one as compared to what they were thirty-five years ago. Nothers has it attracted more attention than in the office of the city Board of Health. "Death from heart disease," says Dr. McConnell, statistician to the Board, "have increased in number to a startling extent of late years, and no satisfactory reason can be assigned for it except the general one that we live faster than we did a quarter of a century ago. In 1860, the proportion of deaths from heart disease to the total number was 1 42 per cent. In 1865 it had increased to 2 per cent, in 1866 it was over 3 per cent, in 1874 it had jumped to over 4 per cent. It had increased more than another 1 per cent in five years from that time, and last year (1886) it was 6 36 per cent. These percentages are to the total mortality, which is the only true way to reach them. It is quite a popular notion that excessive use of tobacco is this aggravating cause. That is quite readily disproved by the fact that of the total number of deaths from heart disease in 1886 326 were women, against 295 men. Of course women do not, as a rule, use tobacco."

—According to a Florida exchange the largest lemon ever grown in that State was recently plucked in Brevard county. It is 12½ inches in circumference and weighs two pounds and two ounces.

—The gingers of Dutchess have organized an active campaign to strengthen the granges, advance reforms and reduce freight charges of the railroads.

—Two hundred and seventy-five thousand tons less of sugar beet-root were grown in Europe during 1887 than in 1886.

Family Fun.

Susceptible Smiles.

—An old round wag has placed the following phrased orar his coal bin: "Not to be used except in case of fire." The cook's relatives are in consternation.

—"How can you afford to give a decent cigar and a shirt for 8 cents" was asked of a Randolph street barber.

"Oh, I get my cigar first an' then go away without the shave, or I shave an first and they skip without the cigar."

—Donnally Delighted.—Ignatius Donnally—Heard anything new about the cryptogram?

Friend—Yes, people say all the English papers are calling you a donkey, a fool and a born idiot.

I. D.—Ah!

F.—Every one of them.

I. D.—Glorious! How that book will sell.

—An American Alliance—"What do you think about this proposed alliance with the South American States?" asked Mr. Brazil as the lamp burned low.

"Ah!" replied Miss Venus, "you must give papa an opportunity to Peru's your bank account. Venus's willing if you have the Argentine."

—In Concord Town.—Native—Kerridge sir!

In the home of Emerson far from the station!

Native—That depends on whether y' want tar see Hash Emson, r Jed Emson 'th hose decks. Think lives pretty hardy, but Jed, he's more'n a mile down th' Lexin'ton road."

—"Didn't I order mi-lu-wai" she shouted to the grocer through the telephone yesterday.

"Yes'm."

"And you sent me vinegar!

"Yes'm, I did. We are out of molasses, and won't have any until Thursday. Try and make the vinegar answer for a few days."

And as he hung up his trumpet he growled to himself.

"The people are getting so particular that nothing will suit 'em."

—Mother (to Billie Emma)—"What are you going to do with that egg?"

Little Emma—"The teacher is going to fill in the history of Columbus, and asked every one of us to bring an egg."

Mother—"But, my dear, I can't spare an egg."

Little Emma—"O's! that doesn't make any difference. The teacher told us to bring some butter if we had no eggs."

—Minister (solemnly). Young man, do you realize when you retire at night, that you may be called before this morning dawns—Yes, sir; I realize it fully and often. I am the father of a three-weeks-old baby.

—Pawkins—Do you know that my wife and I were born on the same day?

Bumpkins—No, indeed! Why that Mrs. Pawkins—

—Young Husband (to Experienced Listener, in confidence)—Jack, I'm in a terrible fix. Mrs. Smith and I have had 365 of the honeymoons in one day by St. Clair yesterday.

Listener—Why, shouldn't it? said Mr. St. Clair, "for there's nothing to stop it."

A Puzzling Question.

Mr. Simpson (pensitatively)—"I love you dearedly, Miss Chumley, but my parents have always prevented my making a declaration of my love." Pause in taking you to become my wife."

Miss Chumley (hesitating but sweetly)—"I confess that I am not wholly indifferent to you, but—"

Mr. Simpson (eagerly)—"Would you mind telling how much you have pay away?"

Anxious to Please.

Landlady (to her star boarder)—"May I send you some of the turkey, Mrs. De Hobson?"

Star boarder—"Yes, thanks; a leg if you please."

Landlady—"Will you have the right or the left leg, Mrs. De Hobson?"

A Sorrow that was Wasted.

Affected lady tourist—"Captain, I feel so sorry.

Captain—"What about, Madame?"

"On account of the poor fish."

"What's the matter with them?"

"They must get so seasick when the water is rough."

A Deserving Case.

Oakland Dame—"Well, what's the matter now? I wouldn't that tramp eat the crust I told you to give him?"

Little Son—"Not yet. He wants me to ask you for some warm water and soap so he can wash hisses? before eating."

"Sakes alive! He does! Go tell Jane to show him to the bath room and ask him to stay to dinner."

THE GERMAN ARMY.

Watching the French Frontier

READY TO SPRING ON FRANCE.

A Crouching Tiger Waiting for Prey.

The following interesting letter from a correspondent at Malta to an Eastern paper will give Monitor readers a good idea of the perfection of drill which the troops of Emperor William of Germany have arrived at:

Once inside the city of Metz you find discipline, hard work and the results of a perfect military system. Fully half the people you see on the streets are soldiers. In the city of Metz to day there are 26,000 men. Along the frontier, in a position where they can be concentrated upon the borders within twenty-four hours, there are over 200,000 men. In time of peace the confinement of so large a number of men as are at Metz within such circumscribed quarters would simply result in license, idleness and disorder. But there is nothing of the sort to be seen at Metz. The men are too constantly occupied. The private soldiers are turned out at four o'clock in the morning. It is drill, drill, from morning until night. The men are marched and countermarched. They are exercised in every form of evolution which could be employed in actual war. The officers are constantly scouring the country hunting up new difficulties to test their men to overcome by preliminary drill. Such discipline, such subordination, I do not think was surpassed in any army. The officers would blow their subordinates off in a breach of discipline, and of the most severe character, for them to appear public in civilian dress. These officers have no time for social hospitalities. They never make calls or accept invitations except among themselves. There is very little entertaining even among the officers of the border. They are too much occupied with their military duties; in the perfection of this tremendous machine which grows more and more into shape.

THE PERFECTION OF THE DISCIPLINE

of the German army can only be understood by witnessing its daily and constant operation. To begin with, the private soldiers are thoroughly trained physically, as well as in the mental details of the military profession. They are all accomplished gymnasts. Although the men in many of the regiments are of medium size they look strong, hardy and resolute. The German army is perfectly democratic in the placing of its men. The sons of the best families, who merely wish to serve three years' term, have to begin in the ranks as common soldiers. They are not allowed to accept the army as a profession and placed in special schools and according to the exigencies they are placed in correspondingly better positions than those who are merely serving their three years' term. But when once a man enters the army his private social positions are absolutely ignored. I heard when I was in Metz of a son of a most distinguished family being called on to do some duty or other. His head gardener also was called out at the same time. The young man had to obey the orders of his gardener, who was called out at the same time. Yes, and under the command of his gardener. The very first day of his service the private of his company came up to wheeling diet for some breakfrecks. The sergeant called and had to see he was present engaged in this work, and took off his cap and did his share for him, but promptly resulted in the punishment of the sergeant for a breach of discipline.

THE SPIRIT WHICH ACTUATES

must pay to his superior extends throughout every hour and minute of the day. Whenever the subordinate meets his superior he must be most attend to him the same offer and recognition of his superiority that he would exhibit on actual parade ground. The first night of my arrival in Metz I was dining at the table d'hote, when a heavy, thick-set German officer entered the room. A slight, aristocratic looking German officer, also in uniform, was leisurely eating his dinner and talking to a friend. The moment the latter entered, the young officer stood up from the table and saluted. He stood with his hand at the side of his head in the attitude of saluting other senior officers who returned the salute and told him politely to sit down. In this particular case I afterwards learned that the officer superior to him was a former instructor in a town where the young officer, the only son of a noble family, was one of his social leaders.

THE TWO MEN IN CIVILIAN DRESS

would not knock each other civilly. But in the army the tradesman's position commanded the respect and obedience of the nobleman. I merely give this instance as an illustration of the absolute perfection of military subordination in Germany. I noticed them constantly as the officers came into the dining room. Every officer who came in saluted those present, and those saluted either arose or bowed formally according to their relative ranks. The working of this discipline, which was shown in a hotel dining room, was of course common at all places of public or private meeting. When the officers pass each other on the streets, no matter if it be twenty times day, the same ceremony, only in a more cut fashion, is gone through. The punishment for any breach of discipline is swift and severe. Yet in spite of the rigor of the discipline and the hardest work imposed, all of the officers and the men look comfortable and contented.

NOT IN SUPPRESSING THE PERSONALITY

of preparation more shown than in the drills at night and in the sudden arming and turning out of the entire force along the frontier upon the shortest possible notice. The larger men officer, when he arrives at night, never knows whether he will be called out within the next ten minutes or at any time of the night. At one o'clock the signal will be given, and then an order is called out for the men, and instantly the entire garrison at Metz will be placed in line. Men will be sent out at double quick up and down the streets, cavalry will go clattering out into the darkness, the artillery men will be whipped out at their posts with the same rapidness and rush as if the enemy were actually at their gates. The men will be followed by shower of rockets. These lead to hillside fires, one hillside lights up another, and so the chain of light runs down the long line of the frontier, and in the morning the men at distant posts. Nothing that could happen now in this way of drill would throw upon the part of France could find the Germans unprepared. They are united, harmonious, and have a perfect military arm.

A Dense Drift Passes.

NEW YORK, Feb. 11.—The remains of Stephen Joseph Meany, the well-known journalist and Irish patriot, formerly of New York, arrived from Waterbury, Connecticut, this afternoon, and escorted by delegations from various societies and press representatives. They will be placed in the receiving vaults of Calvary Cemetery until arrangements can be made to have them removed.

A CHARITABLE DENTIST.

Tooth Extracted for "Three Hail Marys."

The Rome correspondent of a European Catholic paper gives the following interesting account of a celebrated book who is one of the notable characters that exist in the Eternal City.

On Tuesday I was coming home a little tired, after my day's work, and I had come from church to church in the Trastevere, where I usually found myself unable to do much good. A crowd of people was gazing at the tolling bell of the Church of Ss. Cosmo and Damiano, which is called the bell of the Holy Door, because it is only rung on the occasion of the opening of the Holy Door, which is only rung on the occasion of the opening of the Holy Door, which is only rung on the occasion of the opening of the Holy Door, which

LIFE.

"Life is real, life is earnest" — LONGFELLOW.

Man was born to a soldier's vocation, where clears of pain
Flow their banks and mourns them with fame-like trophies,
And they hold the together like lards when wind-storms sweep the plain.

But over the valley, the sloping ascent of a mount
Rent with chasms dark-gaping and treacherous ditches,
Is the steep but the palatable pathway that leads to a comforting front.

Few may reach it, yet thousands desperately, hopelessly strive;
But their limbs are weighed down with the chains of a lifelong endeavor —
In their hearts is a doubt, on their souls is the dust of a grave!

Still they struggle and blitterly fail to accept from their plight,
While the law that are desirable, determined, palatabling and clever,
Smile at their sad condition, as he in a tower, sitting

Secure in the shield of ancestry honor, I say —
Honor to those who are blessed with a changeless heredity!
Steady in climbing, strong in resisting, and firm on the way;

Like a skill that projects on the sea and forever defies
The assaults of the storm, and jibs rush of impetuous waves,
Maintaining unbroken grace from challenge to earth, sea and skies.

Sincerity, virtue and manhood—they are the weapons to win us a triumph in Heaven;
They are the weapons to sustain our foes from the field!
These, then, like the Spartan Immortals, will stand at the door,
Hurling back Satan's cohorts 'till through them a pathway is shown,
Victoriously leaving their course in the battle's red brunt.

Then honor to them valiant few in whose truth they stand!
Honor to those who were visitors where thousands were quartered!
Their proof of a life is the living, the test of an aim in the end!

They are the soldiers of Ormond who fight with Alacrity,
They are disciples of Justice, with spirits unbartered;
They are the prophets, whose words are a moral and omen.

But to those go going still in the valley in downfall and her great sorrowing
Like cattle that listlessly wait for the time to be slaughtered;
What is the use of life—and your carnage, what are they but shrouds!

Hope, honor and peace crown the beautiful summit,

COMMUNION.

Oh! with what joy I the heart doth leap!
To what great give incline,
When in the sacrament God may keep
At first communion time!

The God of heaven and of earth
Thus fills us with his love,
And gives us what is more than a mound hitch
From brightest heaven above.

Although our sins hath shed His blood
And pained him with their sting,
With patience His great sufferings stood,
Our hearts to near him bring.

On Calvary's cross that love shone bright,
With His red blood it flowed;
Pleading the gloom of hated sin —
Its light on all men glowed.

They nailed his feet, they pierced his hands,
They rent His side asunder,
They robbed His heart of life's demands,
And all our sins to bide!

On every day and every hour
The holy priest of God
Renews these pangs, to give us power
The heavenly road to plod.

This sacrifice our hearts doth fill
With love of that sweet union,
Which spell his hand on Calvary hill —
The hallowed Communion.

FAITH.

I watched in the depths of the changing sky
For the moon's crystal silver face;
Observed at first by the clouds that fly,
It rose to a higher place.

It rose o'er the mists that transient stay
A world that is dense and solid;
With its shoes to the earth's central way,
It passed to its throne of gold.

From the depths of a heart that has felt no chill
At the frown of a day that has passed;
That has wept and prayed and hoped until
It has reached its place at last.

In the endless march to the broader deeps
Of the purer realms of light,
It leaves the scene of a world that sleeps
'Mid the frown of a dark'ning night.

Rose Marie.

A True Story of Domestic Life.

"Oh, if you want fine embroidery done," said my friend, Mrs. Rose, "I can show you such work as isn't to be seen out of Germany, and the linoleum there are works of high art. Never an anything in this country to compete with them until I happened, by the merest chance, to stumble upon Rose Marie."

"Rose Marie? I repeated, with a pretty accent. The owner of it ought to be fresh, sweet and lovely as the eglantine, a kind of wild simplicity, you know."

Mrs. Rose laughed.

"Fresh, no," she said. "She is only 22, but she has had too much trouble to retain much freshness; sweet and lovely are hardly applicable to one of the women of Arles, who look more like stately dames than peasants. Yes, she is simple enough, and beautiful, too, if you will, but she will never remind you of the eglantine—poor Rose Marie! It isn't often that her sad lips curve into a smile. I will not tell you her story until you have seen her; it will make you more sympathetic. Come and we will go to her house.

We drove to Revoyre street, a narrow thoroughfare, and stopped before a small house set back in the yard. The borders were gay with verbenas, pinks, and pansies, three old-fashioned virtues of patience and hardihood, giving their best color and perfume to the dreary, unpaved yard. Mrs. Rose "Entree," said a deep voice from within. The room we entered was scarcely furnished, but everything in it was shining with cleanliness. A tall, emaciated old woman sat in an old armchair by the window, with a piece of work in her hands. She nodded to Mrs. Rose, and looked inquiringly at us with her hollow black eyes.

"She is paralyzed," Mrs. Rose said to me in English. "All her lower limbs are numb. Ah, Madame Rosa," in French, "this is my friend, Mrs. L——, who has come to see Rose Marie about some work."

"Take seats, mesdames," with a courteous gesture. "Rose Marie will be in directly. She has gone out on some business. Since left Henri to take care of me, passing with a smile to a beautiful little boy of 4 years old, who was peeping at us from the back of her chair.

"I would like my friend to see that robe Rose Marie is embroidering for Mme. Dupre," said Mrs. Rose.

"It is there in a napkin on the bed," the old woman replied, "if you will take the trouble to get it, madame. Ah, it is so hard to be half alive, so I am able to move from my seat."

Mrs. Rose unfolded the shining folds and held them before me.

A pale maize-colored silk, with tendrils of blue bloss and white convolvulus embroidered exquisitely on it. The grouping of the flowers was a work of art and the finish was perfect.

Mrs. Rosen smiled at my admiration.

"Ah, she works well, does Rose Marie! Madame, she was a famous beauties and lace maker, even in Arles, where the work is so fine. Ever since she was 10 years old she ruined her eyes for work. But her eyes are getting weak, ah, so weak," with a sigh. "And then, if the worst come, my child, she keeps her hands with a convulsive movement and her great mournful eyes filled with tears.

"The poor girl has cried her eyes out," Mrs. Rose said to me in a low voice; "at last, I believe her tears have run out with her failing vision as the work. Whole days she sits here and I will tell you a story. The old woman there does not understand one word of English.

"She married, immediately after the last war between France and Germany, against my advice, Henri Dupre, who has a furious temper, tried to separate them.

"After their marriage she made it so unpleasant for the Prussian that he determined to come to America. He said he would write somehow. Was not then and left his wife and child, but on no account was the mother to come, else more close between them; but if she elected to remain, in Prussia, then little Henri must come to him.

"I think Satan got into the old woman, for she acknowledged that she destroyed the husband's letters to her daughter, and got her nothing about it. As she could not read herself, she knew nothing of the contents, nor where Karl was.

"A year ago she had a stroke of paralysis, and, thinking she was going to die, confessed the wrong she had done to the unhappy wife, who believed her husband had deserted her. What to do she did not know. In that great wide America where was she to find Karl? where write to him?

"At last she determined to come over, bringing her mother with her. She was an only child, and she would not desert the helpless creature who had wrought her so much wrong. The same tree's New Orleans, and Karl had sailed for that port, but could hear nothing of him.

"Madame Dupre," cried the little boy joyously, rushing to the door, "Ah, but I've have stayed so long, my child."

She bent and took him up in her arms, and as she smiled lovingly at him I thought I had never seen a more beautiful creature. It was a grand, calm beauty, which made her look older than she really was.

"We are here before you, Rose Marie," said Mrs. Rose. "We came to see you on business."

"Ah, pardon, madame, but I did not see you," she said, advancing slowly toward us. "I do not know what has come to my eyes, presuming my hand on the link. A mist is before them, and I see not clearly."

Her mother gazed at her as she spoke with a startled look.

"Are they worse, then, Rose Marie? Ah, my poor child, did you go to the doctor?

"You should go so without delay," Mrs. Rose added. "Your strength is too precious to you to be neglected."

"Ah, yes, yes, madame, they are my bread winners; but I will go, positively, tomorrow. Have you seen Mme. Dupre's robe? Do you like it?"

"It is exquisite, she thought to pay you a good round sum for such work as that.

Rose Marie smiled sadly.

"She offered me $15 and I accepted it."

"Fifteen dollars!" Mrs. Rose threw up her hands in surprise. "Do you mean to tell me a rich woman like her, who knows the value of such work, and can well afford to pay it, has offered you the pitiful sum of $15 for what is worth $50? Don't take it!

"I have promised," Rose Marie said in her quiet tones. "Besides, we are strangers here, and our work must be known before we can command prices. Fifteen dollars will keep us a long time, we eat so little."

"Mrs. L——had come here to give you some work, but, of course, under the circumstances, you cannot take it.

"No, madame, not now,"—a distressed look came to her face—"but I may get better soon. I may hear of Karl. It he knew, ah, if he only knew! But he thinks of me as so wicked, never having written to him.

"And have I am, a poor, worthless lump, weighing down them," cried the poor old woman passionately. "Ah, good ladies, perhaps he is not dead, I may go to some charitable asylum. There are so many in this city. It is too much on her, and she owes me no duty, none. I have lived her life and her husband when I was strong and well, and I squandered them, sinner that I am!" leaning her head wearily. "Rose Marie, will you cheer me, and she is breaking her heart. Ah, yes, day by day she is paler and thinner," and I say to myself, 'Can wicked woman who have done this why do you not die?' She turns into a stream of tears.

Rose Marie moved softly to her mother side and laid a hand on her shoulder.

"Hush, mamma, she said trustingly. "You shall go to any hospital you desire, while I can work. I like Karl and he loves me, and I know he will find us out. Mamma, do you want to make me a bad daughter that would desert a helpless and aged mother, for the good fend would ruin me? Hush, mamma, we shall find him.

"Ah, Madame Rosa, I am a wicked, wicked woman to my poor Rose Marie. Ah, yes, I know that God has punished me. I am no madame! I'm Mrs. Rose.

It was a simple, simple fault, but I entangled Rose Marie during the weeks that followed—heavy weeks slow, slowly but surely, the blurred vision grew more and more indistinct. There was an eminent oculist in the city, a good, humane man and an old friend of mine. I interested him in the case, and he examined her eyes, but refused to give a final verdict until his return from Sieroe port, where he was going the next day.

"Bring her back in three weeks, when I return," said Mr. R——. "I will do all I can, and I hardly think it is a hopeless case.

"I think Mrs. Rose and I both fell in love with our beautiful, stately protege, she was so patient, and even cheerful in spite of her misfortune. For the first time in my life I felt the sweetness of a home, and such our home

"Entrez," she would cry, "if Karl would only come, I would fall before him and kiss the ground under his feet."

One fine morning I had taken Rose Marie and her child to one of the city squares where a fine band was playing. She listed music passionately, and in her darkened life it was the sweetest thing that we could do. They were playing the "Soldiers Farewell," and I looked at her, I saw her hands were clasped together, and the tears were rolling down her white cheeks.

"Ah, Madame Rosa," she whispered, "my Karl, ah, he played so beautifully.

"Ah, but I know that little Henri in playing about had slipped through the gate of the square into the street. Suddenly I heard confused cries. "Ah, the little boy. He will be killed." and shaking up my heart stood still as I saw the little fellow almost under the wheels of a press of wagons going and crossing.

But at that moment I saw one of the street players dash down his instrument, leap over the barrier, and snatch Henri from the jaws of destruction, and bear him safe in his arms. I had been too much terrified to utter a sound during this drama, and Rose Marie, sitting by my side, was utterly unconscious of her child's danger.

"What is the noise about? Why has the music stopped suddenly? she asked, but I did not answer. I saw Henri's rescuer, with the child in his arms, looking around for his mother, the little boy pointing to us and talking. As he approached I saw a tall, handsome, and lordly young fellow with gold-hair and auburn blue eyes. I rose from my seat as he came up.

"Here is your little boy safe, madame," he said to me with a bow.

"Henri was not hurt. At the sound of his voice Rose Marie had sprung to her feet and, with a wild exclamation, fainted very gently forward. I heard an answering cry

"My Dear Mrs. Rose—wife my lost love!" and then I understood that Karl was before me.

I will pass over that meeting and the one that followed between mother and son. Karl had made a home at the West, and frightened at his wife's silence, was then on his way to search for her. Order of his letters of inquiry to his old neighbors had been sent, but, of course, Franz Myers, prevailed on by him has hand and heart, "I saved!" Strange! strange!

All this happened more than ten years ago, and the rest of the story is short. Rose Marie recovered her sight, and I spent a very happy day with her and her husband at their pleasant Western home. The old little Henri has grown into a sturdy youth, who he fought a duel with a fellow soldier, and, I believe, he bids fair to be a comfort to his good parents.

Apparition of the Blessed Virgin.

She Appears to a Boy in Palestine.

A recent letter of Mgr. Zouillel, Archbishop of Tyre, published in several of our French exchanges, contains an authentication though brief narration of an apparition of our Blessed Lady at Kafrkedrim, one of the villages situated within the confines of Galilee, near the borders of Palestine. The story goes to prove that the Blessed Virgin there appeared to a boy fourteen years of age. The lad was told to escape away the earth on a spot about three paces distant from the place of his birth in the village, and that he would find a spring of water. He command was obeyed, and, true to the words of the apparition, a beautiful spring of water burst forth.

Since that time numerous bands of pilgrims have visited the spring in search of relief from various maladies. In many cases wonderful cures have been effected, while others have been without result. Among those whose faith and piety have been rewarded by Heaven are counted not only Christians, but Mussulmans and heretics. The church which is near the scene of these wonderous occurrences is a Greek Catholic Church, and belongs to the diocese of Saida or Sidon. There is also near by a monastery of Greek monks of the Order of St. Basil the Great. Among the marvels that have taken place at the spring of Kaphar-Kedrim, Bishop Zouillel mentions the following:

One of the Christian women of the village, a paralytic for many years, was with great pain and difficulty brought to the water, and bathed therein in hopes of effecting a cure. She was accompanied by a Mussulman woman—one of her neighbors—who carried her child in her arms. The faith of the Christian was rewarded—a cure was obtained, but the Mussulman would not believe the evidence of her senses, and declared there was some deception. Laying her child upon the grass, she said she would go and examine the spring for herself more closely.

She was absent about five minutes, between her return the child was dead. The mother rent the air with her cries, but her infant was cold and lifeless in her arms. Suddenly she rushed back to the spring, vowing that her child was restored to her she would have it baptized, and she herself would profess the Christian religion. She bathed the child in the water of the spring, and gradually she beheld life return again through its veins. In testimony of her gratitude, she has baptized her child by a physician who happened to be a witness of the event. In testimony of her gratitude, the overjoyed mother produced the true faith, and contributed most liberally out of her slender means to the support of the little church of the village.

The narration of such events can not but prove the source of edification to our readers, and serve to increase their filial devotion towards the powerful Queen of Heaven, whom the East and the West invoke as the Support of the weak, the Comforter of the afflicted, and the Help of Christians — Ave Maria.

PYNE'S CASTLE PRISON.

A Visit in an Irish Patriot's Fortress.

I have just returned from visiting Bing ies Dyne, M. P., in his beleaguered castle of Castle Pyne. It is a picturesque old-fashioned grand wild and rugged uplands that stretch from the sea to the Knockmaldown hills. It is about four miles from Lismore, the Irish home of the Duke of Devonshire, and about a mile from the once thriving but now impoverished town of Tallow. The castle has six chaded and the approaches to it are so rough and rough that it is almost impossible to get that I at last found it. When I journeyed the last bridge, down into what may be called the castle courtyard, I found myself unexpectedly in the presence of four men of the royal Irish constabulary doing sentry duty. It must be understood that twenty-two men of this force, under the command of a sub inspector, are told off to watch the castle, and some of them pace round its walls day and night.

We stood at the foot of the old, grim, square tower, overgrown on one of the towns with ivy, and said to be eighty feet high. I asked if there would be any objection to my speaking to Mr. Pyne, praised to were willing to admit me. They said that no difficulty would be raised by them, but they greatly doubted if Mr. Pyne would allow me to enter. And, in any case, they warned me seriously against raising the subject. I asked that the reason was, and they pointed out a small aperture near the top of the tower, blocked up with a heavy door, which they said was the only entrance. I had made up my mind to go through with the adventure, but I confess that my heart failed me for a moment as I looked down and drawn up that giddy height by a common "Hook and Hole," suspended from a long boom that did not seem too securely fixed.

I went to the foot of the tower and shouted to Mr. Pyne, who was in a corner room about half-way up, demanding my business. "Is Mr. Pyne at home?" "Yes, sir. "Can I see him?" The face disappeared for a moment, and a voice answered that he came. I asked for a cord to be lowered that I might mount by a rope. Where I sent up a few cabalistic words Mr. Pyne himself came to the loop-hole and half-leaning out on some business. I had to report to the mode of entrance. Mrs. Pyne, he said, would come and speak to me, and I could enter by the way she came out.

Presently I saw a lady waving out of the little aperture near the top and slowly lowered to the ground. I assisted her to alight and to get free from the noose in which she sat. Then came my turn, and presently I found myself swinging like a bale of goods in mid-air. On arriving at the aperture, I was seized by a pair of brawny arms and hoisted in. Then Mr. Pyne gave me a hearty welcome to his prison house. We hunched and smoked together while he gave me an account of his seven months' imprisonment. He declared that he never in his life had been in better health and spirits, and certainly looked the picture of health.

Mr. Pyne says that he is not the least lonely, because the little lady persists in coming to see him every day, and he does not seem to suffer from solitude. He has many visitors, who "brave the perils if the way to spend an hour or two with him. And his surprises are unlimited. He knows everything that goes on in the district, and is kept well posted on such information as a newspaper can give him. He says he is not restricted in being able to escape supervision, and says that when the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland he will quietly enough slip out of the castle. He says he is certain that Mr. Pyne's love for the tournament

EUROPEAN GOVERNMENTS

How the Rulers of Europe are Paid.

In an interesting article on "The Emperor's Income," published in the Hospitaler Zeitung, Herr Karl Hermann gives some details respecting the revenues of other sovereigns and Presidents. It will surprise a great many to learn that German Emperor, William I, has no income at all. Two of the Princes of Germany, the Kaiser and a some 1,250,000 marks (£1,250,000) in the Diet of 1887 so that there is no sum of income for the Emperor at all, but merely a grant, in the shape of appropriations, for granting pensions and gratuities. Consequently, the Imperial dignity is becoming an unpaid honorary office. What income the German Emperor does drive he receives as King of Prussia. In 1886, his revenue amounted for 1887 88 altogether to 12,270,288 marks (£610,000, of which 7,500,000 marks were taken from the income received from public lands and forests, and the remainder (4,500,000 marks) voted by the Prussian Chambers. Out of this, 12,250,000 marks (which comes to 32,317 marks, or £1,614 a day), the King of Prussia has to call his Court, and to keep up his royal house. The expenditure for the imperial house of Russia amounted, according to the published balance sheet for 1886, to no less than 10,000,000 rubles, the civil list alone makes 12,000,000, in that year, or nearly 300,000 rubles (£2,000 a day). In Austria, the Emperor's income represented in the Reichrath, grant a civil list of £800,000, and Hungary adds to it a sum of £200,000 a year, or in all, £1,000,000 a year, or about half the civil list of England in 1886, and a little more than that of the Czar. But this separate income are annually voted by Parliament, and are not included in the sum of the royal house. Italy is also somewhat more liberal than Germany in providing for the Crown. The income of the King of Italy (£950,000) is annually voted for the "civil list and apanages." The income is about £2,000 (or £1,000 a day). The civil list of the Mikado of Japan is 1,000,000 yen (£170,000). Japan also has a council, which, in 1886, voted the Mikado 1,000,000 yen. France pays her President in "salary and expenses of representation, the sum of £200,000 (or not more than little Henri in playing about had slipped through the gate of the square into the street. OUR BOOK TABLE.

Reviews of Recent Publications.

Hilary and Parnassus, or the Martyrs of Ireland. By Rev. Michael Hermann. Published by the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, Philadelphia. H. J. Gallagher & Co., Phila.

There is little a new dramatic construction in this, but the plot is good, the dialogue is lively and Catholic interest, especially will be found not lacking. A few lines but displeased from cover between the lines.

Gaudrille, A Story of the Rebellion, and The Quilt Cabin. Author of Lucia, Dorothy, & Rosa. 3 vols.

The authors of these two excellent juvenile stories both have facilities for entertaining the young. The latter are pleasantly told, and are quite interesting; but of the two, "Gaudrille" is the best. These books belong to the "Hearth and Home Series."

Poems by James Rice. Third edition. Boston: Boston: T. B. Noonan & Co.

Some of the most approved traits of this will are as the constant use of old phrases and words, have caused a repetition of the same thoughts, and his employment of stilted literary language. There are some gently pieces in this volume, however, and of the few, "Eclipse" is our taste is the most meritorious.

The Dublin Review for February is readable, and is evidently reaching the high-water mark of its prosperity. Cardinal Newman's article is strongly thrown many years has been particular, and is a fitting one from the pen of the author of "Loss and Gain." The Cardinal Manning, Mr. Lecky, Mr. Mallock, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Ruskin, Mr. Lang, Mr. Miller, the best colored whose poem is a fine one, and Mr. Lang's "Ballade of Dreams," seem, with language exalted. The rest of the prose is editorial, and the prose articles almost — Cardinal Howard is reported as serious ly ill in Rome that but little hope is entertained of his recovery.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

— The Pope in imparting his blessing to Bishop Durrer, of Netherlands, said: "My dear son, leave nothing undone to provide schools for my children of Louisiana."

— Mr. Thomas Sexton's health has so much improved that he has been able to make the statutory declaration and enter on his office as Lord Mayor But a focus fever has been appointed, for it will be a long time before Mr. Sexton can take part in public affairs.

— James Redpath is dying in New York of paralysis of the throat. When Ireland needs needy friends, the valiant American was among the first to espouse the cause of Erin with both the thunders of his tongue and the power of his pen. We hope that — The various sects and denominations gradually awaken to the necessity of religious schools. At a recent convention of the Baptists of Kentucky at Louisville, one of their prominent ministers said: "You must provide for the education of 215,000 Kentucky Baptists. If you do not, the Catholics will provide it, other denominations will provide it." Sound sense comes slowly.

— The Venerable Servant of God, Clement Mary Hofbauer, Priest of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, was Beatified in Rome on the 29th ult. The decree proclaiming the heroic virtues of the Servant of God was promulgated by Pius IX., on the 14th of May, 1876, and the authenticity of the miracles required for his Beatification was declared by Leo XIII, in a decree dated the 21st of February, 1886.

— A dispatch to the Pittsburg Commercial Gazette from Shamokin, Pennsylvania, says that a curse seems to have followed all those who were engaged in the "Passion Play" scheme of Selmi Morse. It says that the actor cast for the "beloved disciple" is now a street peddler in that town, and in the vaudeville performance he was one of all his colleagues. Selmi Morse has himself committed suicide, and several of the cast have come to a bad end.

— The Liverpool Catholic Times reports that the American Bishops of Litchfield and Salisbury are visiting Germany, Switzerland, and Austria, under a commission from the Archbishop of Canterbury, in order to discover whether intercommunion can be established between the Old Catholics and the Anglicans. It would be something for the Anglican Church, the Manchester Examiner observes, to find that there is one Christ body on the face of the earth which would condescend to hold communion with him!

— The Presbyterians are perhaps the most Catholic portion of the globe. Out of a total population of 1,549,000, it is shown that there are 1,483,000 people professing the Catholic Faith, directed by 1 Cardinal, 2 Archbishops, 7 Bishops, 1 Apostolic Prefect, and 1,546 Priests and Religious. There are 957 churches, 26 seminaries and colleges, 239 convents and 69 hospitals. The different ecclesiastical districts into which the Province is divided, are peopled as follows by Catholics: Quebec, 729,000; Montreal, 419,000; Ottawa, 137,000. In the Diocese of Quebec there are 666 priests, 444 churches 106 convents, 18 seminaries and colleges, 25 hospitals and 1,927 schools.

— A Protestant observer of Catholic and Protestant missions in Japan says: "The Roman Catholic missionaries live with the people they try to convert; they make themselves actually Chinese or Japanese for the time being. Most of the Jesuits are under a vow never to leave the country to which they have been called. It is a different with our Protestant missionaries. They have had their wives, families and comfortable homes; they take a trip to the United States every few years 'to recuperate,' and spend some months every summer at the mineral springs, or a seaside resort on the cool hill lands."

— Persons who are fond of depicting the Irish people as the greatest consumers of intoxicating liquors, should keep the following pasted in their hats: "I saw more intoxicated women in Liverpool than I have ever seen in my whole life before, and some of them were the most hideous-looking objects I ever put my eyes on. On the other hand, I noticed but few drunken men. On Sunday in England bars are permitted to keep open from 12:30 to 2:30, between church hours, and from 6 till 10 in the evening. The regulation is rigidly enforced, but the bars are crowded when open. The number of infant tipplers in large English towns is frightful. Children are sent with pitchers and tin pails for beer, and thus acquire the habit." Thus writes William J. Adams, describing a journey to Europe in the Minneapolis Tribune.

— The Apostolic Letters issued on the 26th of December last in favor of the "Custodia" of the Holy Land, after recounting all that former Popes have done for the support of Holy Places and their Franciscan Guardians, recites that the four collections in each year ordered by Pius VI. to be made everywhere have fallen to a certain extent into disuse, and commands the Patriarchs, Archbishops, Bishops and other Ordinaries of the whole world to see that the collection be made in every parish church at least once a year, either on Good Friday, or on some other day to be determined by the Ordinary. The sum collected in each church is to be sent to the Ordinary, and is to be by him transmitted to the nearest Franciscan Superior who is named Commissary of the Holy Land, who in his turn will transmit it to the Father Guardian of the Holy Land at Jerusalem.

The Mockery of Calling Protestant Preachers "Missionaries."

In one of his Epistles to the Romans, St. Paul, in speaking of the ministers of his day, who, like the Protestant preachers of our times, "not knowing the justice of God, and seeking to establish their own, have not submitted themselves to the justice of God," asks this vital question: "How shall they preach unless they be sent?" No man is entitled to call himself a missionary unless he is sent by God to wander around the sea-coast of that land, and to live in luxurious laziness at better people's expense.

With regard to India, Sir James Brooke, told the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in London: "You have made no progress at all, you are just where you were when you first went to India." Mr. Cruikshank, himself a missionary, spoke similarly of the efforts in China, and hundreds of other writers spoke of their converts which their morality "shocks the feelings of even their heathen countrymen." In Ceylon, the converts were little better, according to Mr. Hammond, and the Rev. James Selkirk, himself an Anglican missionary, said that "by far the greater part of them live as though they had no souls." In Australia, Dr. Lang said the progress made there was "very little indeed." Bishop Colenso, of Natal, declared that all missionary efforts have failed. Speaking of New Zealand, Mr. Fox said that amongst the natives the word Christian was merely a name and nothing more. Another Protestant authority stated that the converts were distinguished from the uncontverted heathenism by "vices," "thieves" and "liars"—three "accomplishments" which, no doubt, they picked up from their heathen "brothers-in-law" who gave them a sectarian "stone" when they asked for the "Bread of Life."

St. Matthew clearly outlines the people of the world against those who called "missionaries," when he says in the seventh chapter of the Gospel: "Beware of false prophets who come to you in the clothing of sheep, but inwardly they are ravening wolves. By their fruits you shall know them." And as the fruits of sectarian "missionary" enterprise are only the Dead sea fruit of fanatical greed and sectarian selfishness, it is no trouble to arrive at the safe conclusion that Almighty God has no hand, act or part in that propaganda of Protestantism which is undertaken for pell, and continued for years in disembodiment, by men and women whose sole study is how they can secure fat salaries under the banner pretense that they are propagating Christianity.

Americans in Rome.

A correspondent arriving from Rome concerning the audience which the American deputation of Catholic pilgrims were accorded by the Holy Father, adds these interesting particulars to what has already appeared in the Monitor's columns

> Amongst Archbishops of Philadelphia and the Bishop of Buffalo stood, one on either side of Pope Leo, and the pilgrims, who were each received separately, were introduced by Abbé Jacobsen of the Vatican College. The Chamberlains on duty for the day were Mr. Stanfish, Mr. Handley, and Mr. Ellis, Bishop of San Francisco, very notable feature of the American audience was the number of Protestants who had come from Europe to attend, and the tone, amounting to tenderness, with which the Holy Father received them all. As each passed, the Pontiff stepped forward and knelt at his feet, the Pope questioned each militarily, and then, when asked for his blessing, would lay his hands lingeringly on their heads, and sometimes, in a most paternal way, while he was speaking to them, would gently stroke them upon the cheeks. Many there have gone away with a depth of insight left in the world to distinguish between the Reality and the Sham, the Divine and the Human. Imagine the Primate of the Anglicans thronged at Canterbury—would gentlemen from New England, even of his own Church, cross the Atlantic to kneel to him, and kiss his feet? Imagine, and be glad because St. Benson had spoken a few words, and stroked or patted them on the cheeks! The thing is too funny to think of. And many of these American Protestants, representing some of the best families in the States, not only felt privileged to log the Pontiff's blessing, but came provided with crucifixes and rosaries and medals, I suppose for the sake of Catholic friends at home. One lady, in answer to Mr. O'Connell's question whether she was a Catholic, said, simply, "No. 'You are a Protestant?' "No. "Not even baptized?" "Not even a Christian, I am nothing at all." The Rector of the American College whispered some horrid words to the Pope, who then received the poor woman as graciously as if she had been a Catholic all her life, and, in blessing her, said "I will pray that this may be the beginning of faith for you." Gifts of money from the Dioceses of Pittsburg and Savannah were presented, and also one by Father Hartnett, which had been set to music. Looking over this, the Pope asked if Americans had usually great ears for music. Mgr. O'Connell, without any apparent hesitation, assured the Holy Father that the Americans are a very musical people."

— One of the most costly Rosaries ever manufactured was recently presented to the Holy Father among the Jubilee gifts. It came from La Verdice and is of solid gold, exquisitely wrought and enamelled, representing the Passion of the Redeemer, on medallions in embossed gold, the Joyful Mysteries on a blue ground, the Dolorous Mysteries on a green ground, and the Glorious Mysteries on a gold ground. This splendid gift, in value $3,000, is wholly in gold, hand wrought, and adorned with diamonds and hard-coloured pearls, and offering of the Noble dames of La Verdice; the crucifix blazes with large diamonds, while each medallion is set with jewels of great beauty and price. The Pope expressed his warmest admiration of the superb work of art, and duly congratulated the brother M. Poussielgue-Rusand, who was present at the audience, on the taste and skill of the conception and execution thereof.

Catholic Churches in the United States.

Thinking that the readers of the Monitor would be interested in ascertaining the different denominations which Catholic churches have been dedicated to the service of Almighty God, we spent some time last week in compiling the following statistics from Sadlier's Directory for the current year In doing so, however, we were astonished to find that in hundreds of instances the names of churches were omitted from the reports of many Dioceses, whilst locations and names of Pastors were returnable given. This is simply a piece of negligence which should be promptly remedied next year, and we hope the compilers of both Catholic Directories will call the attention of the Bishops and Rev. Clergy from whom they receive their returns to this fact, so that some may no longer be injured by having their names omitted in connection with the churches dedicated to their patron saints in the Directories.

Sadlier's Directory reports the total number of churches at 6 825, and Hoffman's Directory gives the number at 7,094, but the experience which we have gained by going over their pages, impels us to say that both Directories are wrong and that there are more than 8,000 Catholic churches in the United States.

In the classified statistical tables which we have compiled from Sadlier's Directory we find that the churches designated in the following list are represented by the figures annexed: The number of churches placed under the patronage of the Blessed Virgin Mary, according to our Blessed Lady's different titles, are 1,393. St. Joseph comes next with 687, then follows St. Aloysius with 466. The other churches follow in the following numerical order: St. Peter, 179; St. Michael, 175; St. John, 149; St. John the Baptist, 124; Sacred Heart, 122; St. Patrick, 121; St. Anne, 112; St. James and St. Paul, each 103; SS Peter and Paul, 88; St. Francis of Assisi, 82; St. Bridget, 74; St. Rose, St. Francis Xavier, St. Boniface and Holy Trinity, each 68; St. Augustine, 65; St. Anthony, 62; St. Vincent de Paul, 61; St. Thomas, 60; St. Charles Borromeo, 56; St. Bernard, 53; St. Stephen and St. John the Evangelist, each 50; St. Lawrence, 47; St. Aloysius, 45; Holy Cross and St. Martin, each 42; St. Louis, 40; St. Andrew, 37; St. Francis de Sales and St. Teresa, each 36; St. Nicholas and the Holy Family, each 35; St. Agnes and St. Catherine, each 32; St. Matthew and St. Stanislaus, each 30; St. Ignatius and St. Celinda, each 28, St. Benedict and St. Luke, each 17; SS. Philip, Raphael, Mark, Henry, Columbanus and Gabriel, each 16; SS. Joachim, Anthony of Padua, Wendelin and Zachary, each 15; SS. Andrew and Philomena, each 13; SS. Denis, Clare and Guardian Angels each 11, SS Peter, Paul and Apollonia, Lawrence O'Toole, Ambrose, Isaac Jogues and Holy Redeemer, each 10. All the other saints have less than ten among which are the following titles of the Blessed Virgin: Our Lady of Solitude, of the Lake, of the Valley, of the Cascade, of the Isle, and of the Sprinkling, Our Lady of the Mountain, of the Rock of the Snow, of the Rocks, of the Tears, of the River, of the Gulf, of Mills, and of Chicago, Our Lady and of Lourdes. The churches are dedicated under the titles of Our Lady of Lourdes, of Knock and of Loretto. Other churches are dedicated to The Three Kings, The Fourteen Holy Helpers, The Forty Martyrs, The Fourteen Holy Martyrs. Among the Irish saints not mentioned above, are SS. Aidee, Brendan, Canera, Colman, Cronin, Finbar, Fintan, Flannan, Hall, Kevin, Killian and Kran.

Death of Don Bosco.

The name of the Abbé Don Bosco is required by Catholics in every clime and serve the character of this holy Apostle of Charity is known deep grief will be felt that the benign influence and the charitable deeds of the founder of the Society of St. Francis de Sales for the protection of abandoned children, has been lost for ever to the world. It is a sad, deep regret, for those that we announce the death in Turin of this holy man, whose pure soul found rest on the 31st ult., his death-bed being surrounded by many priests of his Congregation among whom was Mgr. Cagliero, also of the Salesian Congregation, Vicar-Apostolic of Northern Patagonia. A sketch of his life and labors will appear in our next issue. E. I. P.

—Apropos of the Lenten fast, a good story is told of an Irish Catholic who was at sea as a cabin passenger on a steamship during the week in which Ash Wednesday occurred. At the dinner table all the passengers were eating meat, but the gentleman in question, being in the minority, as all the heavenly grace to refuse it. So he was making his meal off of fish, butter and milk, when a Presbyterian preacher, thinking to embarrass the Catholic before all the passengers, remarked: "Your action in refusing meat seems most absurd. Why do you refuse to partake of the one yet out of the substance of the same animal?" The Catholic gentleman, in no wise disconcerted, replied quickly and pointedly: "Why do I eat eggs." "Faith, it is no more absurd for me to eat of the substance of the cow than it was for you to eat of the substance of your mother and not to eat your mother." And then he quietly continued his meal, to the laughter of all present against his tormentor.

—By a recent decision of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, the Holy Father has granted (1) a Plenary Indulgence once a month for the daily recitation of the Little Office of the Blessed Virgin; (2) also an Indulgence of seven years and seven times forty days for each time it is said; and, moreover, (3) his Holiness grants three hundred days for saying Matins and Lauds (7) and (3) can be gained but once in the day.

How the Church Prospers Under Persecution.

> Translated from Revue de Neuchatel, Switzerland, by Rev. Hugh Walsh, Mt. Carmel, Columbia Co. Oregon, West New Jersey, Diocese of Trenton. Hope and Written Publisher, Iowa.

> To the mind of a thinking Catholic it would appear that the very fact of the prosperous condition of the Church under many forms if persecution during the last Protestants to the truth that such a Church must have some Divine Principle, which, in order to preserve a continuous existence the high both Pagan and modern persecutions, and to flourish in countries where all the available military force of the land, backed up by penal laws, were used to crush out Catholicity and to crush the Church of Christ.

The History of Newfoundland is filled with facts which serve to demonstrate the deep-rooted antipathy of England to not only the Catholic religion from the soil of that colony Yet, notwithstanding the cruel laws against Catholicity, and the inhuman treatment of Catholics themselves at the hands of England's minions, the Church of God unmoved by last the foundations of Catholicity in that Island. The Mass, Hall open the very spot where England erected gibbets to hang Catholic men, women and children, for the crime of Catholicity, the Church prospered so far that the Catholics of Newfoundland contribute more than the Protestants of England's colonies

Health Hints.

TURPENTINE IN DIPHTHERIA.—The antiseptic treatment of diphtheria by turpentine has recently been introduced in Germany by Boms, of Dorman. It is given in the same manner as in cases of phosphorus poisoning, that is to say, as pure turpentine highly rectified, in doses of a soup spoonful twice a day to adults, a dessert spoonful to children of more than five years of age, and a teaspoonful to young infants. Milk and wine are given abundantly at the same time. The administration of it causes a sensation of burning in the stomach, epigastric pressure, vomiting and the passage of stools strongly impregnated with turpentine odor. The use of turpentine was suggested by the experiments of Koch, which showed that it had an action on the problematic bacilli of diphtheria. But the treatment itself is much more than problematic.

BLINDNESS IN BATHS.—Inasmuch as blindness has frequently resulted in before from inflammation of the eyes following childbirth, the following directions are given to prevent that disaster. First, immediately after the birth of the baby, wipe the eyelids and all parts surrounding the eyes with a soft dry linen rag, and scon after with a soft rag—a flat, worthless, lint fabric is not good—dipped in a cup of water. Do not make hay parlors so dreary!

Mrs. Sputter. Such a tedious evening I could hardly keep awake until it was time to go home.

Mr. Tuddy: "Everybody was yawning. I had a sad headache in the morning." Sympathetic story.

Mr. Lab Dr. Dab. Deceed pekey, be Jove if it wasn't. Bwoke me all up—yes it did, really!

Parting shots: "Humbug;" "A perfect fiasco;" "No fact or taste in such affairs;" "Well if simply sent regrets, I'd prefer reminded me of a Sunday School picnic;" "Too stupid and tiresome for anything."

Inalienable Rights.

A way has made up the following summary of what he calls the "Inalienable rights of Americans," and which are not enumerated in the Declaration of Independence.

To know any trader business without apprenticeship or experience.

To marry without regard to fortune, state of health, position, or opinion of parents or friends.

To have a wife and children, dependent on contingencies if business, and in case of sudden death, leave them wholly unprovided for.

To put off upon hireling strangers the literary, moral and religious education of children.

To teach children no good trade, hoping they will have, when grown up, enough to live on the industry of other people.

To enjoy the general sympathy, when made bankrupt by reckless speculation.

To that the government when possible. To build offices without being competent to discharge their duties.

To build houses with nine and six-inch walls, and go to the funeral of tenants, firemen and others killed by their fall, were ready a very little better with one cap and a half of water, and a piece of butter half the size of an egg; pour this batter boiling hot over the egg and sugar just as it goes to the table; force to mash. Beat while mixing the boiled butter and sugar.

WARM OUT CAKE.—Four pounds of sugar and one of butter; beat five eggs with the sugar; put one teaspoonful of soda in a [illegible] one teaspoonful of cream of tartar in [illegible] cream the butter and flour together, add the eggs and sugar and other ingredients; stir well and bake in a tin mould.

LEMON TARTLETS.—Rub a teaspoful of sugar in lumps over the rind of a fresh lemon, so as to absorb all the essential oil; squeeze the juice of the lemon over the sugar; crush it fine with a spoon; add to it two eggs, well beaten, and two tablespoonfuls of sweet butter; boil all together, and bake in little patty pans, lined with puff paste.

PARMESAN SMALL FISH.—Any kind of small fish may be prepared in the following manner: After being well washed and wiped it be put in a pan with a little butter, and sprinkled over with pepper, salt and nutmeg, of bread scraped from a crusty loaf, with an onion chopped fine, and fried in the oven freely sustain to half an hour.

STEWED CHICKEN.—Season and stew a chicken in a quart of water until very tender; take it out on a hot dish and keep it warm; then put into the liquor a lump of butter the size of an egg; mix a little flour and water smooth and make a thick gravy; season well with pepper and salt, and let it come to a boil. Turn over the chicken and serve hot.

OYSTER STEW.—One pint of oysters, drain them in a colander; put liquor to scald with the same quantity of water; set the oysters in small pieces. When the liquor is hot, stir in pulverized crackers mixed with milk, and then add the oysters. Boil two minutes, add a large teaspoonful of butter, a little pepper, and a pint of milk. Boil one minute.

GRAHAM GEMS.—One egg well beaten, one large coffee cup of sweet milk, one and one-half teaspoonfuls of Graham flour, one half-cup of super fine flour, and a little salt. The batter should be of the consistency of wheat griddle cakes. Warm the pan on the top of the stove, and grease each compartment well. Then fill with the batter to within a quarter of an inch of the top, and bake in a quick oven half an hour.

Drinking Before Meals.

An acquaintance of the writer who has suffered sorely from dyspepsia for a number of years, and has tried most of the numerous remedies a host of kind friends have recommended for her relief, hands us the following article from the Medical News with the request that it be printed. Our dyspeptic friend has found great relief in following the directions, and it is hoped others may also be benefited.

"In the morning the stomach contains a considerable quantity of mucus spread over and adherent to its walls. If food enters at this time the tenacious mucus will interfere, to some extent, with the direct contact between the food and the stomach necessary to provoke the secretion of gastric juice. A glass of water, taken before breakfast, passes through the stomach into the small intestines in a continuous and uninterrupted flow. It partly distends the stomach, stretching and to some extent obliterating the rugæ; it dilutes and washes out the tenacious mucus; it increases the fullness of the capillaries of the stomach, directly if the water is warm, and indirectly in a reactionary way if it is cold; it moves peristalsis of the alimentary tract, wakes it up (so to speak), and gives it a morning stimulus and washing out. Care must be taken not to give cold water when the circulation either local or general, is so feeble as to make reaction impossible. We should not risk it in advanced age, nor in the feeble, whether old or young, nor should it be given in local trouble, like chronic gastric catarrh. In these cases it is best to give warm or hot water. The addition of salt is very beneficial. Such a time honored custom as drinking soon after the beginning of a meal could only have been so persistently adhered to because it is having been found by experience to be the most opportune time. It does something what warm or hot water, with the addition of salt does, and more, in that it is—revives and excites the flow of gastric juice.

Family Fun.

A Successful affair.

Mrs. Rattle "Good night, dear Mrs Spread your party has been such a success."

Mrs Gush: "Yes, indeed, Mrs Spread but than your parlors are always charming,"

Miss Satin: "Oh, delicious! I am always aging so to my friends. How do you manage to make them so delight."

Mrs. Spread. I have enjoyed every moment of it.

Mr. Tuddy: "Ah, yes; so have we all. A great success I assure you, Mrs Spread."

Mr. Lab Dr Dab "Ah, yes, really, you know, you know. Quite the most charming party of the season; ah, yes, really."

All at once "Good night" "Delight ful evening" Enjoyed it so much" Such a success!" "Must congratulate you!" Splendid!"

On the Way Home.

Mrs. Rattle. "Tha most perfect born of the season."

Mr. Rattle: "The Spread parties are so utterly tiresome. It takes me two weeks to recover from the effect of one."

Miss Satin: "It turned out just as I said it would.—A flat, worthless, utter failure. Why people will persist in giving parties to make hay parlors so dreary!"

Mr. Tuddy: "Everybody was yawning. I had a sad headache in the morning." Sympathetic story.

For The Nervous The Debilitated The Aged.

Medical and scientific men are at last awake to the problem of the long needed medicine for the nervous debilitated and aged. Many preparations have been more or less extensively advertised and put on the market, but the medical profession has at last discovered that none of them contain the elements necessary to give tone and vigor to the nervous system, except Paine's Celery Compound. It is the great nerve vitalizer and invigorator, and is the only medicine which can always be depended upon to cure nervous prostration and weakness, and expectation has proved that the most sceptical do not need the testimonials of the cures it is performing. ARCHBISHOP LAMY.

(CONCLUSION FROM FIRST PAGE.)

diocese of Santa Fé. This is not quite correct, and the facts are contained in the saintly Bishop of Durango, Dr. Zubiria, had been advised in time, and had immediately set out for New Mexico, taking the mission of the diocese, and performing every where his episcopal duties. But he had not been consulted in the dismemberment of his diocese, and he felt quite unwilling to quietly stand by it. The clergy had another reason, they had been living at ease, twelve hundred miles from their Bishop, and they dreaded the presence of a superior, who among them; I might add, that many of these were utterly opposed to American rule, either civil or ecclesiastical.

The indefatigable Dr. Lamy set out on horseback, with a military guide, for the city of Durango. He had an interview with the Bishop and everything was settled amicably. Without taking time for rest he returned, having performed a journey of three thousand miles on horseback.

In his new diocese he found but few priests, and it was destitute of educational establishments of any kind. The young Bishop put his hand to the grand work of building up Catholicity with an energy that cannot be overpraised. His adventurous and long journeys over the vast plains extending from Kansas City to Fort Union, plains with no inhabitants, then, save wild beasts and roving Indians, besides an occasional Mexican about also hundred miles in extent, Dr. Lamy crossed those plains twelve times for the welfare of his vast diocese.

THE SISTERS OF LORETTO—THEIR ARRIVAL AT SANTA FE.

Bishop Lamy, ever anxious for the good of his diocese, desired to enrich it with devoted labors, to such the young, knowing well that this was the best way to reach the people. Having heard of the self-devotedness of Father Navinick's spiritual children, and of the severe training they had gone through, he considered that they were the very ones whom Divine Providence had designed for the laborious work for which the Holy See had confided to his care. He applied for a colony of Sisters and his request was there fully granted. Faithful to its traditions, and to its spirit of self-sacrifice, the Institute could not refuse a mission that seemed to promise nothing but hardships and privations.

Early in the Spring of 1852, the missionary Bishop left Santa Fé to assist at the First Plenary Council of Baltimore, crossing for the first time the dreary wastes called with reason, the "American Desert." In the commencement of June he reached Baltimore, and the preparations were soon made. But before returning to New Mexico, the Bishop went to New Orleans, to visit his niece who was still at the Ursuline Convent where he had placed her to test. There had already been some cases of cholera on board, when, on Friday, the 18th, at 2 o. m., Mother Mathilda was attacked. Her sufferings lasted till about two o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, when she quietly went into the hands of her Maker, after having received the Sacraments of Penance and Eucharistic Unction at the hands of the Bishop. Two hours later the steamer landed Todd's Warehouse, six miles from Independence. The remaining passengers of the Mission had contracted the disease, and the landing was truly affecting, the Sisters following the corpse of their dying Mother and the death-bed of their Mother. The inhabitants stood in such dread of the cholera that the Sisters were not allowed to enter their houses, and were therefore obliged to sleep in the sacred cars.

The next morning, July 17th, three of the Sisters with the Bishop and some other persons, accompanied the carriage which conveyed the corpse of Mother Mathilda to the last resting place, in the graveyard of Independence. But on the way they were met by a sheriff and his posse, sent by the authorities to forbid entrance into the town, for fear of contagion. However, the Bishop's firm attitude, and perhaps, too, compassion for the sad situation, made the official relent. They continued their way to the graveyard, and there they saw the old earth receive into its bosom the remains of her whom they had loved and reverenced.

The Mother Superior, Mother Magdalen, quoted by Bishop Mass, "how took the Sisters, Catherine Phelan, Hilarion and Hilton, to the town and left them there, whilst Mother Magdalen remained in the carriage with Sister Monica. But on the night of the following Monday, July 19th, Sister Magdalen herself was attacked with the cholera, and made what she believed to be her last confession. The Sisters were assisted for ladies, especially religious ones, with tender dread, and Bishop, enable to make better arrangements, had the two dying Sisters removed to tents about two miles from the town. The poor Sisters were much better off than in the warehouse, although they had to lie on the ground, with only a blanket, and nothing but the canvas tent to screen them from the heat of July.

After a few days Sister Magdalen began to recover. On Sunday, July 25th, the three Sisters came from Independence, and heard Mass said by Bishop Lamy in a tent. It was impossible for Sister Monica to proceed any further, her recovery being doubtful, and in spite of her desire to pursue the journey to New Mexico, she returned to Independence to let her health should be sufficiently restored to return to the convent at Loretto. As Sister Magdalen could travel in a carriage, although very weak, they left Independence on Saturday, July 31st, to go into camp some four miles distant, where the Bishop and part of his suite (for the others were sick at Willow Springs) had already encamped. There the Sisters went to Confession, and the next morning received Holy Communion at the hands of the Bishop.

After the death of Mother Mathilda, Sister Magdalen was chosen to fill the office of Superior, and this election was promptly approved and confirmed at Loretto. Dear Mother Magdalen, after thirty years of untold toils and privations, has been stricken down by palsy, but her heart and her heart are as warm and as sound as ever, and although she gave up the charge of the flock inhabiting community into the hands of another self, Mother Superior, yet she is still the guiding spirit of the institution.

On the evening of August 1st, they reached Willow Springs, a fine water place few miles from Westport, and there found the other party ready to start. So they lost no time, and started all together; but they had proceeded only a few miles when one of the wagons broke down, and there they were obliged to camp in order to repair the wagon.

Some time was spent the next day to repair damages. On the following Sunday, the 6th, the Bishop said Mass four all in their tent on the banks of the Humboldt and Ten creek. Thence they passed Hallingsant, and on the crest of the Rocky Mountains Council Grove. All confessed that evening, and on the next morning received Holy Mass at the hands of the Bishop. The Sisters, according to their rules, renewed their vows at the time of Mass. The next day the Bishop left the Sisters at Council Grove, and still they reached Pawnee Fork, on the spot where now stands the town of Larned, at the junction of the Pawnee Fork and the Arkansas. For the first time, buffaloes were killed by the party, and fresh meat enjoyed.

Resuming their march on the 7th of September, they passed the Arkansas River at Ellinor, and encamped some two miles beyond, into still in Kansas, when a party of Indians, four hundred strong, fell upon them and surrounded them. All were terrified, particularly the ladies. The was the Indians' hunting ground, and whenever they could do so with impunity, they would attack caravans. On this occasion they seemed peaceable, the Bishop was even enabled to baptize the child of a native Mexican woman. Still as their intentions were not known, and the Indian is often treacherous, the Bishop thought it prudent not to make any more, forgiving the wagon, but as they seemed disposed to remain, he ordered his company to march in the evening, and the caravan traveled all night, as the Indians do not generally make their attacks in the dark.

Las Vegas was reached on the 15th. This was the final Mexican town reached. The next morning the Bishop said Mass in a private dwelling no far from the town. There he stopped two days, and saw Father Lamy, who had recently left Santa Fé, and with the Sisters to what was then called the Bishop's ranche. To show the zeal of the Bishop for the spiritual welfare of those under his care, I must say that the whole journey he said Mass and preached every Sunday but one, when it was absolutely impossible, still prayers were said in common.

The Bishop set out from Las Vegas on Wednesday, and on Thursday, the 21st, the teamster, quietly entered his episcopal city, to prepare the way for the coming of the triumphal procession of the Sisters, which was to take place on Sunday, the 25th, the day left the ranch and stopped for Santa Fé, where they arrived at four p. m. The people, led by Father Lamy, the other Mexican priests, went several miles to meet them. Father approached the city, the crowd increased so much that the carriages could scarcely pass through the streets of the ancient metropolis. Triumphal arches had been erected, and the bells of the cathedral tolled, the Sisters, who were received at the door of the cathedral, presented with holy water, and led to the foot of the altar. The Te Deum was sung, accompanied by Mexican music, violins, guitars, etc., and the ceremony terminated with the episcopal blessing. Thence the Sisters were conducted by the Bishop to their Convent and the clergy to the house prepared for them, and the priests who had accompanied the party were lodged at the house of the Bishop, and thus ended a long and painful journey, full of accidents and dangers. All felt glad at being finally at home at Santa Fé.

BISHOP LAMY GOES TO ROME.—THE FIRST ORDEAL OF MISSIONARIES.

The Mexican Government did not strictly speaking persecute the church, but its want of care for both church and state was unpardonable. Dr. Lamy, ably seconded by his Vicar-General and learned friend, Father Machebeuf, went everywhere to see for himself, and set to work to correct abuses, to establish schools, to form religious associations; and thus they were employed during the winter and spring of 1853. In the fall of 1853 the energetic young Bishop set out from Santa Fé with a caravan to cross those formidable plains, the American Desert, the home of the Indian and coyote—a desert extending nearly nine hundred miles in breadth, from New Mexico to the Missouri river. He rested only a short while at St. Louis, Cincinnati and Baltimore, from whence he paid a flying visit to Loretto to give news of the saintly origin of the Institute and to petition for more Sisters. This time also his request was readily granted, and arrangements were made to start for Santa Fé the following spring. The Bishop, being no time, embarked at New York, soon reached France, and at once visited Messrs. Perron, the old Bishop of Clermont, who had ordained him priest and blessed his vocation to the missions of Oceanica. From him also he received warm and fair recommendations to the Bishop of the diocese to help him in his mission of New Mexico.

In the meanwhile, the Bishop, having paid a flying visit to his brother Etienne and other immediate relatives, set out for Rome, where he was kindly received by Pius IX, and Cardinal Barnabo, Prefect of the Propagandi. He received great praise and encouragement, and obtained leaving the Holy See. He then embarked half-way, taking several companions on the same route, and early in the spring of 1854, reached Clermont. A number of young ladies generously offered themselves to him, and he expressed their willingness to cross the ocean and work under his paternal direction. Without regret they were willing to leave the fair shores of their native country, to come to the almost desolate part of the field of the labors of the family. They were inured from their minds' but the thoughts of the future beyond up their spirits.

Among the saintly men who heard the voice of God in their hearts were the Revereds Talard, a priest from Madrid, Martin, of the diocese of St. Flour, Francis, Anthony Lehard from Clermont, Stephen Abel, of Clermont; Peter Eguillon, the actual Vicar General of Santa Fé and parish priest of the cathedral also a priest from the diocese of Clermont.

Among the Sentimentes were the Revereds Joseph Guerin, who was then deacon, and who ordained priest on the 23d of December of the past year, at Santa Fé, by Bishop Lamy. Eugene Pallet, parish priest of Belon, then a Subdeacon; and X. Vaurie, a clerk in minor orders, who died on the day of their arrival at Santa Fé.

Forming the caravan were also the Revereds Kolopp Drim, a priest from New Mexico, who had accompanied the Bishop to Europe; Hesse, Jesus M. Orpez and Florencio Gonzalez, who had been sent previously to France for a course in the Seminary of Clermont; an Irish family named Covington, and Mr. Macarthy, a lawyer who acted as major domo for the Bishop in the journey.

Dr Lamy and his band of priests and levites arrived at Lexinville, Kentucky, to watch the end of May, 1854, the Bishop going to Loretto they reached Cincinnati, where they had to wait for a month, as we were arrived at Kansas City and Westport, and being there directed to camp at Willow Spring, a romantic spot, with a flowing stream of water gushing from under a huge bluff, the surrounding hill green, and covered with a profusion of good size, with an abundance of grass for the animals. There they remained for six weeks waiting for the colony of Sisters who were to come and join them. In the meanwhile, the Bishop was disappointed, as the Sisters were unable to send any of their number to the missions of New Mexico. The Bishop had his hands full buying animals, wagons and provisions, and making arrangements for a speedy departure.

Hardly had Bishop Lamy arrived at Willow Spring, after completing his preparations, and being sure that the Sisters could not come, than, although late in the afternoon, he resolved to move to this camp. An order was given to that effect. All was bustle in the camp. Messengers gathered their animals and hitched them to the wagons, and before a short delay all together took the broad road toward Santa Fe, their destination. But they had proceeded but a short distance when one of the wagons broke down, and they were obliged to stop without water for the night.

The caravan consisted of fifty wagons and one hundred and twenty men. The wagons as they had left Willow Springs, Father Eguillon, who was very sick, and whose bed had been in such a terrible condition that the physician had really thought he had to amputate it, fell asleep under. He had been carried to my house in Kansas City, suffering, should a fever be the cause, to be forwarded to his mission, than to the among Mexicans, Father Dan D. Barry. The Sisters, a mattress was brought, and the Sisters placed in it, and carried to the Bishop's carriage, as a victim for the sacrifice. They left Willow Springs on the 19th of September, 1854.

The private wagons were placed on dismissing, and the Sisters, with the Bishop, Father Machebeuf, followed, and have arrived safely and faithfully for years.

Armagh.

It is intended to erect a memorial to the late Dr. Moriarty, Bishop of Kerry, Armagh. A meeting in furtherance of that object was held on the 2nd, in the Synod Hall, Armagh, when the great celebrator of the "Mortals Mind" for the Irish Church, Dr. Gibbs the Most Rev. Dr. Logue, who presided, said the best way they could perpetuate his memory would be to erect a memorial which would in fact be his great chair of the Church of Ireland. The Very Rev. Dean Bigger, P. P., Burgomaster, said the Grace, the Most Rev. Primate, had sent a letter to the meeting in which he spoke of the Archbishop of Armagh, and the Most Rev. Primate said that he was not in a position to be present at the meeting and this debt of the late Primate had cleared off. Mr. Lynch, M. P., said the Most Rev. Primate had made it his wish for the proposed memorial diocese of Santa Fe. This is not quite correct, and the facts are contrary to it. The saintly Bishop of Durango, Dr. Zubiria, had been admitted to his diocese, but immediately set out for New Mexico, visiting every mission of the diocese, and finally ending every where his episcopal duties. But he had not been consulted in the administration of his diocese, and he felt quite unwilling to quietly stand by it. The clergy had such or reason, they had been living at ease; twelve hundred miles from their Bishop, and they feared the presence of the new Prelate among them, I might add, that many of them were utterly opposed to American rule, either civil or ecclesiastical.

The indefatigable Dr. Lamy set out on horseback, with a solitary guide, for the city of Durango. He had an interview with the Bishop and everything was settled amicably. Without taking time for rest he returned, having performed a journey of three thousand miles on horseback.

In his new diocese he found but few priests, and it was destitute of educational establishments of any kind. The young Bishop put his hand to the grand work of building up Catholicity with an energy that cannot be overpraised. His adventures and long journeys over the vast plains extending from Kansas City to Fort Union, plains with no inhabitants, then, save wild beasts and roving Indians, boasting no cities. Though about nine hundred miles in extent, Dr. Lamy crossed these plains twelve times for the welfare of his vast diocese.

THE SISTERS OF LORETTO—THEIR ARRIVAL IN SANTA FE.

Bishop Lamy, ever anxious for the good of his diocese, resolved to entrust it with devoted Sisters, to teach the young, knowing well that this was the best way to reach the people. Having heard of the self denial of Father Navinck's spiritual children, and of the severe training they had gone through, he concluded that they were the very ones whom Divine Providence had designed for the laborious mission which the Holy See had confided to his care. He applied for a colony of Sisters and his request was cheerfully granted. Arrived in Santa Fe, and to the injunctions of its founder, Loretto could not refuse a mission that seemed to promise nothing but hardship and privations.

Early in the Spring of 1852, the missionary Bishop left Santa Fe to assist at the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore, crossing for the first time the dreary waste called with reason, the "American Desert." In the commencement of June he reached Baltimore, and the preparations were soon made. But before returning to New Mexico, the Bishop went to New Orleans, to visit his sister who was still at the Ursuline Convent since his departure for Santa Fe.

"On Sunday," says Mother Magdalen in her "Annals of Our Lady of Light," June 27th, 1852, after Mass, the Sisters destined for Mexico, left the Mother house of Loretto; Mother Mathilda, Mille and Sisters Catherine, Mary Magdalen, Monica, Hilaria and Roberta. The same day they arrived at Bardstown, and on Thursday morning, July 1st, they reached St. Louis and were kindly received by Archbishop Kenrick. In a few meanwhile they visited the Convent of St. Ferdinand, in Florissant, and spent a few days with their own Sisters. As soon as they heard of the Bishop's return from New Orleans, they joined him at St. Louis, and on the 10th of July left by the steamer Arcadia, which was to convey them as far as Independence. With them they visited a family, and some other persons belonging to the Bishop's suite.

The Sisters had accepted the mission in a true spirit of self-abnegation, as they little dreamed, as the spires of the city receded from view, how soon Providence was going to put their virtue to a test. There had already been some cases of cholera on board, when, on Friday, the 16th, at 2 a. m. Mother Mathilda was attacked. Her sufferings lasted till about two o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, when she gave herself into the hands of her Divine Spouse, after having received the Sacraments of Penance and Extreme Unction at the hands of the Bishop. Two hours later she was landed at Jones' Warehouse, six miles from Independence. In the meantime Sister Mathilda had contracted the disease, and the landing was truly affecting, the Sisters following the corpse of their dying Sister and the coffin of their dear Mother. The inhabitants and the crew, dread of the cholera that the Sisters were not allowed to enter their houses, and were therefore obliged to remain in the warehouse.

The next morning, July 17th, three of the Sisters with the Bishop and some other persons, accompanied the carriage which conveyed the remains of Mother Mathilda to the last resting place, in the graveyard of Independence. But on the way they were met by a Sheriff who had been deputed by the authorities to forbid entrance into the town, for fear of contagion. However, the Bishop's firmatitude, and perhaps, too, compassion for the sad spectacle, conquered this difficulty. They continued their way to the graveyard, and there they saw the cold earth receive into its bosom the remains of her whom they had loved and reverenced.

The Bishop," continue Mother Magdalen, quoted by Bishop Mace, "now took the three Sisters, Catherine, Hilaria and Roberta, to the town and left them there, while Mother Magdalen remained in the warehouse with Sister Monica. But on the night of the following Monday, July 19th, Sister Magdalen herself was attacked with the cholera, and made what she believed to be her last confession. The place was ill-suited for latter, especially religious ones, sick with cholera, and Bishop, unable to make better arrangements, had the two dying Sisters removed to lists about two miles from the town. The poor Sisters were much better off than in the warehouse, although they had many inconveniences to bear, and had nothing but the canvas tent to screen them from the heat of July."

After a few days Sister Magdalen began to recover. On Sunday, July 25th, the three Sisters came from Independence, and heard Mass said by Bishop Lamy in tent. It was impossible for Sister Monica to proceed any further, her recovery being doubtful, and in spite of her desire to pursue the journey to New Mexico, she returned to Independence with Sister Magdalen, who had entirely restored to return to the convent at Loretto. On Sister Magdalen could travel in a carriage, although very weak, they left Independence Saturday, July 31st, to go into camp some four miles distant, where the Bishop and part of his suite (for the others were waiting at Willow Springs) had already encamped. There the Sisters went to Confession, and the same evening received Holy Communion at the hands of the Bishop.

After the death of Mother Mathilda, Sister Magdalen became the Superior, and this election was promptly approved and confirmed at Loretto. Dear Mother Magdalen, after thirty years of untold toils and privations, has been stricken down by paralysis; her head and her heart are as warm and as sound as ever, and although she gave up the direction of the flourishing community into the hands of another self, Mother Francisca Lamy, she is still the guiding spirit of the institution.

On the evening of August 1st, they reached Willow Springs, a fine watering place a few miles from Westport, and there found the other party ready to start. So they lost no time, and started all together, but they had proceeded only a few miles when one of the wagons broke down, and there they were obliged to camp in order to repair the damage.

Some time was spent the next day in repair damages. On the following Sunday, the 8th, the Bishop and Mass-saver an Indian lost on the banks of the Big Blue River. Ten creek. Thence they passed Burlington and on the eve of the Assumption reached Council Bluffs. All embraced the Sacraments and on the next morning received Communion at the hands of the Bishop. The Sisters, according to their rules, retiraed their vows at the image of Our Lady. The camp was removed, and the Mass was said until they reached Council Bluffs, on the next morning, a distance of twenty miles, at the junction of the Platte River and the Missouri. For the last time, the Sisters received Holy Communion at the hands of the Bishop. Remaining three days on the Bluffs, the Bishop, Sisters, Mass-saver and the Indian left Fort Atkinson, and encamped some miles from Indian Agency, a place of resort of Indian warriors, four hundred strong, full upon them and surrounded them. All were terrified, particularly the Indian. This was the Indians hunting ground, and whatever they could do as with impunity, they would attack parcants. On this occasion they seemed peaceable, the Bishop was even enabled to baptize the child of a squaw. But an woman. Still as their intentions were not known, and the Indian so numerous, the Bishop thought it prudent not to make any move, lest they would resist, but as they seemed disposed to remain, he ordered his company to march in the evening, and the caravan traversed a night in the Indians do not generally make their attacks in the dark.

Las Vegas was reached on the 18th. This was the last Mass-station. Bishop Lamy, next morning the Bishop and Mass in a private dwelling not far from the town. There he assigned two, and one to Sister Magdalen (who had recently joined him) with the Sisters to what was then called the Bishop's ranche. To close the end of the Bishop for the spiritual welfare of the Sisters, for his sake, I must say that during the journey he had Mass and Communion every Sunday but one, when it was absolutely impossible, still prayers were said in common.

The Bishop set out from Santa Fe on Wednesday, and on Thursday, 24 of September, quietly entered the ranche, to prepare the way for the caravan, entirely unnoticed of his own people. On the eve of the day, 25th, the party left the ranche and start for Santa Fe, where they arrived at 10 a. m. The people, led by Father Otero and other Mexican priests, sent several miles to meet them, before approaching the city, the crowd increased so much that the carriage could scarcely pass through the streets of the ancient metropolis. Triumphal arches had been erected, and the Bishop, the different churches were pealing. They was received at the door of the cathedral presented with holy water, and led to the feet of the altar. The Te Deum was sung, accompanied by Mexican music, violins, guitars, etc., and the ceremony terminated with the episcopal blessing. Thence the Sisters were conducted by the Bishop, Vicar General and the clergy to their new home prepared for them, and the priests who had accompanied the party were lodged at the house of the Bishop, and thus ended this long and painful journey, full of accidents and dangers. MUSINGS OF NAPOLEON THE GREAT ON ST. HELENA.

I revelled long in life's young dream,
When youthful pulses ran high,
Was lured by war's absorbing theme,
Unmindful how a mote might roll;
I tasted all the chalice of life
That Fame and Fortune's power could bring,
Yet fearless sought the martial strife
When Islam Death was on the wing.

The battle clang, the clash of arms,
The deadly issues, the caution's roar,
Could give me more of ideal charms
Than acts of peace or golden store;
The conquered hand and regal crown,
From sire to son authroned to reign,
Obeyed my beck and feared my frown,
Nor dared to say my power was vain.

Empires and nations at my beck,
In helpless ruin crumbled down,
And less proud Europe failed to check
The power of my fast course;
I deemed a power akin to God,
Was vested all in me alone,
And understood my fast I trod
The Temple of this Holy One.

Oh! what is glory, wealth or fame,
Or all the pomp of Emperor;
He proudest deeds an empty name,
His life, misleadingly near;
Yet who that saw me on the day
The diadem had crowned my brow
Could think I should be cast away,
A captive king unhonored now.

My shackled life was famed in war—
Its prowess gains could belap be—
On martial fields a conqueror,
Death was in my scentless;
Hell proudly on, yo bondman wave,
Keep pace with Time's unfathom'd deep,
Thy empire can claim no resistance even,
Compared to those that o'er me sweep.

Fair Josphine! my heart in vain
Feels now a fond regret for you;
Oh, could I but recall the pain
I wanton caused your heart to rend,
My sorrow would soon be vain
And peaceful as sweet summer shower,
Had I had given a hundred balm
Of love to soothe your closing hours.

On St. Helena's barren shore
I taste the humiliest of despair,
My hopes lost I stand on a mere,
Weak captive in the lonesome's lair;
As such my wild life's fitful scene,
I usually find a mere dream
That I had parted Josephine,
Or tried to sever the Fatalit's course.

Fond mother, sisters dear, farewell;
Ou brothers, son, God's blessing pour,
Heaven great we meet where sorrows shall
Where sorrow's tide quite ebbed no more.
And sweet Heavenly peace at last
In this religious temple to me
By my dear mother in the past—
To me a child beside her knee.

Forty years of time of this one bright world,
I honor the gifts of the land and free,
Where the flag of the Cross in fatin unfurled,
I welcome the message of Jubilee.

Pray, tell your ruler that papal tiara
And pomp mean to time.
At length the lady beckoned to her to Kneeling in humble and reverential fear.

Oh! whisper my blessing to that rich alms
Where the fires of freedom spontaneous spring!
Where the bulls of the Vatican fulminate
The scope of hope which the angels sing.

A True Story of the Fortunes of an Emigrant.

Some years ago, while travelling from Cork to Dublin, I got into conversation with a quiet, ladylike person, who traveled in the same carriage. She informed me that she had spent many years among her friends, and whenever she contrived to come to be six months. My degrees we came to be on friendly terms. She told me several amusing incidents of her time in America, and we reached our journey's end I was in possession of her entire history, which was, indeed, an interesting one.

Her father had been a tenant-farmer, who, being barely rack-rented, had a hard struggle for existence, particularly as he had a large family to support.

As soon as the oldest girl had reached the age of eighteen years her parents decided on sending her to America, thinking it the easiest way of providing for her, and also hoping that she would assist them by her earnings in providing for some of the younger members of the family.

She was a handsome, intelligent girl, and rather liked the idea of going to America, and many were the protestations she made that she would send all the money she earned except barely what she required for clothing. On reaching the "Land of Promise" she wrote announcing her safe arrival, and after an interval of about two months a second letter came, enclosing a cheque for a small amount, and saying that she had got a good situation, attending an invalid lady, and after that all correspondence ceased.

Three years passed away, and as no tidings of their absent child reached the anxious parents, they came to the conclusion that she must have died.

In the meantime their affairs had gone from bad to worse; their children were growing up; something must be done, so a second girl (the narrator of the story) was sent out to America.

Hard was the struggle to pay the passage money and buy an outfit—even though it was a scanty one—and when all was done they remained but five shillings for pocket-money for the poor young girl.

However, this did not give her the least concern. Strong in her innocence, and ignorant of the world, she parted, with many tears, from her sorrowing family, and, with "hopes high burning," stepped into the tender which was to convey her to the emigrant ship.

When she landed on the dock at New York, where her sister had landed a little more than three years before, she felt frightened for the first time. However, she got her trunk stored up as she saw other passengers had done, and, having any friends to go to, wandered away into the city, not knowing what to do next.

It was midday when she landed, and the poor girl kept walking helplessly about the streets until evening came on. She was getting very anxious to provide a lodging for the night, but knew not how to set about it. She was afraid to make inquiries of the people whom she met in the streets, as she had a vague fear of being directed to an unsafe lodging-house.

In the meantime, night came on, and still uncertain what to do, but getting uneasy, she wandered on until she entered a street composed entirely of private houses of a respectable class, some of which had porches to them. While passing one of these she noticed that the door was open, and she suddenly occurred to her that perhaps she could sleep in the porch.

Accordingly, she entered the porch, and, it was delicious to sit down, for she felt exhausted; so she drew out her bonnet and, while her tears fell fast offered up a Rosary to the Blessed Virgin to protect her during the night.

While thus occupied she heard a step approaching, and soon, to her terror, a gentleman entered the porch. She sat perfectly still, hoping to escape his observation. However, just as he was about to open the inner door with his latchkey, he noticed her, and asked, in rather a stern manner, what she wanted there at that late hour.

She burst into a passion of tears and sobbed as if her heart would break, and as soon as she could speak, she begged that he would allow her to remain in the porch for the night, as she did not know where else to go. A few questions drew from her the fact that she had only that day landed in New York, and that she had no friends to go to.

The gentleman, on hearing this, opened the inner door and desired her to follow him, saying that he would get a lodging for her. She obeyed, and he led the way into a comfortable kitchen, where two or three female servants were sitting at a table taking their tea.

In a few words he explained to them that he wished them to provide a bed for the girl and to provide for her wants in every way and then, saying he would speak to her in the morning and see what he could do for her, he left the kitchen.

The servants were very kind, and made her quite comfortable for the night. She was more easily imagine than describe the feelings of the poor girl on finding herself so safely lodged, and fervent were the thanks she offered up to our Blessed Lady. We had so visibly protected her.

Next morning, after breakfast, the gentleman, whose name the servants informed her was Mr. Lloyd, came out to speak to her, as he had promised.

"Well, my good girl," said he, "what are you able to do?"

"I will try to do anything you set me at, sir," replied she.

"Can you clip a hedge?" said he.

"Well, I never did anything in that line, sir," was the reply, "but I will try if you will be so kind as to show me how."

He seemed pleased with her answer and said:

"Very well, come out into the garden, and I will show you how to set about it."

She went out with him into a beautifully kept garden, and while she was admiring the flowers he went into a shed in which the gardener's tools were kept and presently appeared again, bearing a large hedge-clipper. He then took her to one end of a fine hedge which surrounded the garden and showed her how to set about clipping it. He stood watching her for a few minutes, and then, saying she was getting on very well with it he left the garden.

She worked away for about half an hour, and was beginning to get interested in her occupation when the hall-door opened and two servants appeared, one carrying an arm-chair and the other a foot stool, which they placed on the terrace in front of the house, and then stood by respectfully while a beautifully-dressed lady moved gracefully forward and took possession of the chair.

She dismissed the servants after giving them a few directions, and then sat for some time looking at the girl clipping the hedge.

The latter continued to work away assiduously, casting glances of admiration at the lady from time to time.

At length the lady beckoned to her to draw near, saying she wished to speak to her.

"I heard from my husband," said she, "how he found you in the porch last night. I suppose you have no friends in New York or they would have met you on your arrival?"

"I have not a single friend here, ma'am," replied the girl. "A sister of mine came out some years ago, but we have not heard from her for nearly three years so, of course, she must be dead."

"Why, you must be dead, said Mrs. Lloyd, "but she may have grown careless about her family."

"No, ma'am," said the girl, while her eyes filled with tears, "I am sure she must be dead. I don't believe she could forget those who loved her so much, and whom she loved in return, whilst she had life."

Mrs. Lloyd turned very pale.

"What part of Ireland did you come from," said she, "said what is your name?"

"I was born in a place called Mountmellick in the town of M——in the County Cork," was the reply, and my name is Rose M'Donnell."

Mrs. Lloyd started from her seat, burst into tears, and threw her arms round the astonished girl, exclaiming:—

"My sister! my sister! oh, what a shame it was for me to neglect you all as I did. My poor mother! what trouble I have given her, but I will try to make up for it now."

One may easily imagine the joy of poor Rose on finding that it was indeed her long-lost sister who stood before her.

It was some time before either of them spoke coherently, but when they had gone calmer, the elder sister explained how it was that she had treated her family with such neglect.

It appeared that she had lived for about six months with the invalid lady whom she hired with on arriving in New York. This lady had been very kind to her, and showed her intelligent and anxious to learn, taught her many things, used to get her to read to her, and in a little time treated her more like a companion than a servant. In the meantime Mr. Lloyd, a gentleman who had a large business in the city, and who saw often visit this lady, took a fancy to the handsome Irish girl said, finding the living companion, addressed her, as she was now mistress of a beautiful house and blessed with a husband who anticipated her wishes.

She confessed, with tears of shame, that she had left her poor invalid friend, surrounded by everything that could make life enjoyable, she had married a second time, and that whom she had left struggling with poverty in an Irish farm-house.

All her old affections for her family revived on meeting with her sister. She wrote a penitent letter to her parents, in which a cheque for a large amount was enclosed as a peace-offering, and lived at her earnest desire and with Mr. Lloyd's consent, continued to reside with them until her marriage, which took place about twelve months after her arrival in America.

Such was my fellow-traveller's tale, which was ended a little before we reached Dublin. I drove to my lodgings, and, when I parted, I received a cordial invitation to visit her in New York if ever anything should ever take me to that side of the Atlantic.

"A WOMAN MADE OVER."

A Funny Incident in Real Life.

"Hannah," said Farmer Hull, as he, hung out into the farm-house kitchen, "be you expectin' a letter?"

"No, ye answered her wife promptly, "who's writ?"

"O dunno, cuhsa it's the high flyin' sister of yours, Juliet! What's her name. Like enough she's tired of livin' starched up in the city—leastways I guess the real human feelin, anyway—so she's comin' here to make us a visit."

"Do she say so?"

"Well, not exactly. Et wasn't put in the law an' consumers nuents when we was married yet you was to open my letters, nor read them, either. Take an' open it yourself."

Mrs. Hull opened the letter and read to read it.

"Now, said Mrs. Hull, handing him the letter, "read it, cuhsa it's just the other way—Juliet wants us to go an' visit her. She says she'll make the expense, an' I go suffers' for somebody to make over, an' what d'ye thinks about them?"

The old farmer read the letter with much care and pumtashing.

"Mal' sez a visitin' what they eat breakfast in the middle of the day, and wear dinner clothes in the middle of the week? I'ragber guess not. But, mother, if you want to go, I'm another man than I was, for I can hev the use of the old mare fetched—you nigh about broke her in, I reckon, I'll go—fine."

"There's my best alpaca!, said Mrs. Hull thoughtfully. "It's as shiny as silk. But, I'll hev to make a new bonnet to go in. I hoped that the shiny girls there wear real silk an' satin every day."

"Poor things," said her husband, "must be dreadful hev to dress fine to death all the time. Where's the ink horn! I'm goin' to write to the children thet their mas goin' a visitin'."

After manifold preparations Mrs. Hull was ready to go and visit her stylish sister, the rich city widow.

The farm-house by sister said to her was "Hannah Hull, you're a fright. I wonder you stay."

"Why, Juliette, I think you're real mean," said Hannah, with some spirit. "I guess I'd look pretty fine if I hadn't my bonnet coat nearly 40."

"Well, I'm sorry for, goodness sake, you have no style. You're lived down on the farm. Why don't you look like—

"I be one 50, Juliette, but then I'm only two years older than you."

"Hush! Never say anything about your age, it isn't polite."

"Why, Juliette, I think you're real mean," said Hannah, with some spirit. "I guess I'd look pretty fine if I hadn't my bonnet coat nearly 40."

"I be one 50, Juliette, but then I'm only two years older than you."

"Hush! Never say anything about your age, it isn't polite."

"Hannah, I must make you over."

Mrs. Hull made such a long visit that her husband became uneasy. The droughtiness and pies were getting out, and besides he was lonesome. He wanted his Hannah home again. He didn't hanker after the city, but he made up his mind one day that he would send for his wife home.

"The old gal will be glad to see me," he said to himself. "It's a mount killed her I expect by this time, sittin' up so straight an' smilin' all the time with a frisk, an hem away from me. I'll be boun' it'll give her a turn to see me."

It did. The sister had tried the glass of fashion and the mould of form with wonderful effect on Hannah. She had also introduced Mrs. Hull into "society."

Poor Mr. Hull carried he wardrobe into a darkened parlor by a smirking maid.

"Hain you a card, sir?" she asked politely.

"I don't play keerds," said the old man, reproachfully. "You jest tell Hannah there's a man here to see her."

"Her garden, sir."

"Her garden, eh? You hain't done nothin' Just go and tell Mrs. Hull there a gentleman wants her."

The girl went, and the old man chuckled to himself. He were his store clothes and a buggy and shaved to the back of his jaw. Sarey looks fine about his rugged face when he thought of it.

The door opened and a strange lady entered with a very pale face and a stylish glaze. She wore a voluminous blue silk dress, and walked on shoes that were mounted on Pawnee heels. Her hair was a stylish gallow.

"Hannah didn't say anyth'n' about emy other woman a visitin' here. Who kin she be? Jest as big!"

As the strange lady advanced at a queer hippity-hippity gait, something in her presence grew familiar.

The old man got to his feet and levelled one hand over his eyes.

"Good morrin', ma'am," he said hesitatingly. "I was expectin' to see my wife, Hannah. I kinder thought you might be her sister. I ain't seen her in a good many years, but she ain't er young er you be."

A shrill, affected laugh, that died in a fat, shrill, greeted him.

"He don't know me! Juliette, come here. Dear fellow! I knew he was safe."

The old man looked at her attentively.

"Leather hair on a sensun of 50! Red pears in her cheeks like a gal of 16! Where's the old woman that was my wife, Hannah? I don't want no ballet dancer in her place."

"Dear friend, to be fashionable," sneered Hannah, sitting into a hand on the floor.

"I've spent hundreds of dollars on her! exclaimed her sister, as she looked on, "and this is your gratitude."

"You've made a chimn o'her, perpetual jiggs—I'm a sensun o'jiggs."

"It's a perpetual motion," sobbed Hannah.

"It looks wuss than a barn dore, an' look at her cheeks."

"Blooms of youth—fill a bottle," grumbled Juliette. "She's onda cover."

"Hannah!" exclaimed her husband severely, "I'm ashamed of you!"

"So be I," added his wife, "but if you lire in the city you must do as city folks do."

"What's your naw alpacky that you thought good enough for the President's wife?"

"In the closet upstairs."

"Get into it and wash the paller outer your gray hair, and the red offen your cheeks, an' kiss your husbin' fust. I never show yer face at conference mentin' again!"

"Don't a crank," said Juliette to her weeping sister upstairs as she tried to soothe her.

"No, he ain't! an' I was a fool to think I could be made over. Salem alive, how glad I am to get into my own shoes again."

The Jones's drove out of the city that afternoon, cuhsa fasting as a religious ceremony. The country was fine, and the Jones were getting out, and besides he was lonesome. He wanted his Hannah home again. He didn't hanker after the city, but he made up his mind one day that he would send for his wife home.

"The old gal will be glad to see me," he said to himself. "It's a mount killed her I expect by this time, sittin' up so straight an' smilin' all the time with a frisk, an hem away from me. I'll be boun' it'll give her a turn to see me."

A VISION IN TULLAMORE.

Written by T. D. Sullivan, during his imprisonment in Tullamore Jail.

Here within my little study, where, amid twilight gloomily creeping
Three fantastic lights and shadows on the wall and on the floor,
I was thinking of two nations that for many years of sin
Had known naught but deadly hatred and contentious sad and sore,
Naught but deadly strife and hatred and contention sad and sore.

And I thought all this is blameful, its not only sad but shameful,
All this plundering and oppressing and this sifting jokes of scorn,
Tis its pattern that is stronger that has been the chief abuser,
Let her play this part no longer, let this cruelty give over
Turn to ways of love and kindness, and this cruelty give over,
And have peace forevermore.

While note myself thus speaking on the stairs I heard a creaking
And someone softly stealing up to listen at the door.
Then said I: "Vision cast for me, I pray you to come and hear me,
Take a seat or stand near me; let us talk this matter over—
"Tis a crime and serious subject, let us talk it calmly over."
Then I opened wide the door.

There a being, thin and shanky, white of visage, tall and lanky,
Looking ill at ease and cranky, came and stood upon the floor;
In his hands some keys he dangled, keys that hanky clicked and jangled,
And over his right optic a large patch of black he wore—
When it fell he slowly raised it, and replaced it as before.

"Now," said I, the shape addressing, "don't you think 'twould be a blessing,
If this Anglo-Irish conflict coming down from days of yore—
If this ancient feud—war not—could be changed to peace and gladness,
And the holy ties of friendship could be knit from shore to shore?
And no words but words of kindness pass across from shore to shore?"

Quoth the lank one, "Tullamore."

At this word I marvelled truly, for it seemed to come weirdly,
As a misplaced exhibition of his geographic lore;
So, my thread of thought resuming, I said: "There are dangers looming Ever for the land we live in, and they come from far and near—
What shall strengthen and sustain her when the battle thunders roar?"

Then said I: "Across the waters Erin's faithful sons and daughters,
Now have force and bitter memories binding in each bosom's core;
Think what peace and joy would fill them and what happiness would thrill them
If the news came that Erin's children had ceased to be at war—
It she spoke the word of freedom to the land their souls adore,
That the word was "Tullamore."

SAINTS OF MARCH.

Anniversary Days During the Present Month.

1st. ST. DAVID, ARCHBISHOP.—St. David, the patron of Wales, was born of a princely family in the Kingdom of Ceredigan, and at an early age entered the service of the Church, and after leading a most exemplary life, died A.D. 544.

2nd. ST. SIMPLICIUS, POPE.—He succeeded St. Hilarius as Pope in 467, and died in 483, after reigning eight years.

3rd. ST. CUNEGUNDES.—This Saint was daughter to Henry, Count Palatine of Luxemburg. She married St. Henry, Duke of Bavaria, and received the Imperial crown with him in 1014. The last years of her life were spent in a Monastery where she died a very saintly death, on the 3rd day of March, 1040.

4th. ST. CASIMIR, PRINCE OF POLAND.—He was born October 5th, 1458. Being wedded with a fragrant virgin, he lived his last hour, and died a happy death at Vilna, Lithuania, March 4th, 1484, in his twenty-three years.

5th. ST. KILIAN.—ST. KILIAN was the first bishop of the Irish mission, and was born either at County or Cork, in 592. He journeyed to Rome to obtain the Catholic doctrine from the fountain-head, and, returning to his native country, he was made bishop of a recluse. He afterwards passed into Germany, where he died.

6th. ST. COLETTE.—She was born at Corbie in Picardy, in 1380, and at a tender age entered the religious state, dying at the ripe old age of seventy-six years, on March 6th, 1447.

7th. ST. THOMAS OF AQUINO.—This illustrious Doctor of the Church of whose magnificent works we have already spoken, was born in 1226, at Belcastro, Spain, and after leading a life of matchless piety and sanctity, he died March 7, 1274.

8th. ST. JOHN OF GOD.—St. John, surnamed of God, was born in Portugal, in 1495. He redeemed the errors of a loose youth by the practice of the virtues of religion, and died in the odor of sanctity, March 8th, 1550.

9th. ST. FRANCES.—St. Frances was born at Rome, in 1384. Much against her wishes she married a Roman nobleman, in 1396, who in 1415, declared his intention to take a second wife, and induced his first wife to take the same course. She entered a Monastery, and died in 1440.

10th. ST. KESSOCH.—This Saint, who was celebrated for the many miracles which he performed, was born in Scotland, and died Lerm and Rhin, in Scotland, and died in 518.

11th. ST. CEBLAND MEDMOND, OD.—Constantine, surnamed the Great, was born at Thessalonica, and Methodius was his brother. They both embarked in arduous missionary work among the Sclavonians, in Illyria. The dates of their death and burial are unknown, but they are accurately known, although there are many fragmentary relics and accounts of them extant.

12th. ST. GREGORY THE GREAT, POPE.—He was born at Rome, in 540. In 575, he renounced the emolument of a high civil position and the world, and became a Monk. He died on Sunday, March 12, 604, aged 64 years.

13th. ST. MEDRIS, ABBOT.—He was an Englishman who, passing into Ireland, became a Monk and subsequently a Bishop, in 1096, and died.

—Miss Bessie Martin and Miss Annie Ranney, two well-known society belles of Baltimore, took the veil at the Convent of the Visitation, in that city, recently.

—Montreal will shortly have the presence of two more Religious Orders, the Franciscans and the Christian Brothers. The Franciscans, it is understood, will found a monastery there.

—Mgr Kirby—eighty-fifth birthday was recently celebrated at Rome. Mgr Kirby is the oldest rector the Irish College has ever had. He was a classmate of the Holy Father's.

—The Province of St. Louis has more religious than any other Province in the Church. They are the Bishops of Dubuque, Leavenworth, Kansas, Omaha, Kansas City, Concordia, Lincoln, Cheyenne and Wichita.

—Father Sullivan, who has been pastor at Cumnings, Illinois, for several years, is about to leave his parish. He, it appears, he has been unable to fill service on account of asthma, and intends to go to California in search of health.

—A second thanksgiving service was held on Sunday, the 22d ult., at the Catholic Cathedral of Sydney, all the Archbishops and Bishops of Australia being present. The service was the celebration of the centenary of New South Wales.

—The great Catholic chief of the Maoris, New Zealand, the Hon. Mr Takiu Ngatata, died on the 7th ult. Deceased was over 80 years of age. The funeral was attended by 20 the chiefs of the tribes and a large number of people. The Archbishop of Auckland officiated at the funeral ceremonies.

—The nuns of the Sacred Heart, recently from the New Mexico Territory, have left for the benefit of the New York Catholic Orphan Asylum, Fifth Avenue. Every lot add at $18. Four thousand people were relieved during the year.

—Father Xavier, missionary priest in China, has been resident in Pekin for 25 years. He is a Mandarin of the third class in the Empire, and is decorated with the blue button. He is a linguist, and fluently speaks language, and knows Chinese as well as French, Italian and Latin.

—St. Benedict's Church, for the colored Catholics of Belmont, N. C., was recently dedicated by Bishop Gibbons, of Baltimore, who is also Bishop-elect of North Carolina. This is the first Catholic church for negroes in North Carolina. It is in charge of the Benedictine Fathers.

—The Jews were protected in Rome during the ages when they were banned and persecuted by the Christian rulers of Europe in turn. It was but natural and fitting that the Jews should be protected in Rome. It was but natural and fitting that the Jews should unite with all the world in mourning the loss of Pius IX., and the Rome Leaten season in his own Diocese. It is expected that on or about Easter Sunday he will return to Rome, and that he will be in time to the interests of the Catholic University, which he also had to open, and an extensive tour of the country in that behalf.

—The Rosary was obtained in the way of a rosary from a rough-hewn stone cotton under Canterbury cathedral, where heretofore the Rosary had been formed into a chapel. The skull is still preserved, and it is said to be magnificent. It is a beautiful piece of the face one of the finest ever seen. The crown is of a beautiful material, and the rosary which the chroniclers relate took off the top of his head.

—Sister M. Angela died at the Sisters of Mercy Orphan Asylum, at New Haven, Conn., on the 8th inst., aged 72 years. She was at one time the Mother Superior of the Order of Mercy in Providence, R. I., and Rhode Island. She had been in the convent since 1844, and had spent many years of her life as the pioneers of the Order in that part of the country. Her death was very sudden. Her Mass by a Monk was Mary J. Fingerald.

—Negotiations have been concluded between the Secretary of State and Bishop Fink, of Leavenworth, Kans., by which the property of St. Patrick's Church of Fort Leavenworth has become Government property, which is now and has had the use of it for the past 40 years, and the sum of $11,000 was placed at the disposal of the Bishop, who will rebuild the chapel in another part of the city, and will provide sufficient seats than the present large and beautiful building.

—The rapid growth of the Order of the Sacred Heart in this country has necessitated the formation of a new province. It takes from the Eastern with the Mother-house in Paris, and the Mother-house in St. Louis, and the Mother-house in Rochester, New York, the Rev. Mother Superior, who has been Superior of Sacred Heart Convent, Omaha, Nebraska, and Sister Mary Mark,

THE MONITOR.

OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE ARCHDIOCESE OF SAN FRANCISCO.

The MONITOR has the largest circulation of any Religious Paper published on the Pacific Coast.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1888.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

—Thanks to a friend at Riverside for a copy of the Daily Press containing the synopsis of a lecture on the Mormon Church delivered by Hendy Vill. We will call Brother Taylor what we think of his nonsense next week.

—It seems Mrs. Cleveland joined with her husband in making that present to the Pope. The bordering and setting of the Constitution was the work of her own hands. This knowledge will no doubt cause a fresh "howl" from the Methodist preachers!

—We deeply regret to announce the death of the Rev. J. P. Daly, of the Order of Preachers. Father Daly was being recommended as likely to become a worthy successor of the great Dominican, Father Tom Burke, in pulpit oratory. His death occurred at Naples, whence he intended to proceed to Rome. Father Daly was only 37 years of age. R. I. P.

—A secular paper well defines the detestable crime of suicide when it says that suicide is dissection on the felo de se. It is a confession of defeat in the contest of life. It is a shot in the back on which we dare not apply for a pension. It is a self-mutilation to avoid the draft. Instead of tragedy it is comedy so poorly acted that it excites our pity and our scorn. It is a leaf torn off the back of the book so that we never finish the story or see how the hero comes out.

—A cablegram published recently attributes to the Holy Father the following language in the distribution of his Jubilee gifts: "I should feel that I was acting against the commendatory intentions of the Catholics who have contributed the gifts which now adorn this magnificent exhibition and who have given such generous offerings of Peter's Pence, if I were not to dispose entirely of all this wealth for the exclusive benefit of the Church and of the Holy See."

—Michael Davitt has written a letter eulogizing Wendell Phillips. Davitt's estimate of Phillips is that no other name in American history embodies so fully the fundamental principles of the Declaration of Independence as does that of Wendell Phillips. His interpretation of the great truths of that immortal charter, says Davitt, was not blunted by prejudices or narrowed by geographical boundaries. He preached liberty as a gospel for mankind, and not as a creed for a favored people or nation.

—We present to our readers this week the superb sermon which was delivered by Archbishop Ryan of Philadelphia on the occasion of the laying of the corner-stone of St. Patrick's Church in Rome, and we begin the consecutive insertions of the Catholics who have contributed the gifts which now adorn this magnificent exhibition and who have given such generous offerings of Peter's Pence, if I were not to dispose entirely of all this wealth for the exclusive benefit of the Church and of the Holy See." knowledge to be gained from it by old and young, but also in order that all classes may fully realize the solidity and supernatural life that is inherent in God's sanctuary—the glorious Church for which the Holy Father have so cheerfully bled and suffered through out centuries of crucial martyrdom.

—On the third page we print a very interesting sketch of the life and labors of Don Bosco, whose funeral took place on the 2nd inst. at Turin, and at which it is said that the spectators numbered about a hundred thousand. Foreigners attended in hundreds. Leaves and flowers from the wreaths and bouquets laid on the coffin were eagerly sought for in order that they might be preserved as souvenirs of the departed. Permission was demanded from Signor Crispi, the Italian Premier, to inter the body of this holy religious in the Church of the Salesians, but it was refused. A petition asking leave to transfer the remains to the sacred building is to be presented to Humbert.

—The answers given in the Morning Call to "Three Historical Questions," seem to have aroused considerable interest. A number of subscribers have sent in communications on the subject, complaining of the one-sided anti-Catholic view presented by the Call, and requesting the Monitor to give the Catholic side of the argument. We hope next week, please God, to commence to open fire on the Call's air castles, and to show how utterly unreliable are the sources of the Call's information on the "Three Historical Questions," as well as to furnish our readers with argument and evidence which will prove the Call's libeller Littledale to be one of the most wilfully malignant liars in England, and we will also show up the hundreds of errors which are strewn along the slimy path of his slanderous career as an anti-Catholic crank. The Call's antidote will comprise several articles, but we think the cure will be effectual for many years to come.

—Several correspondents having called our attention to the proceedings of the Oakland Commission of Charities at its meeting last week, we made diligent enquiry into the truth of the report printed by the Oakland Tribune, and find that there is little or no truth therein. The anti-Catholic expressions attributed to ex-Governor Perkins were never uttered by that gentleman, and are entirely antagonistic to his well-known liberality both in act and sentiment. A preacher named Wendte, who was present, stupidly said that the Catholic Ladies Aid Society of Oakland "had been formed by an order of the Bishop." Thus evincing the usual ignorant prejudice against the honest Protestant preachers as close as the sting does to a scorpion's tail. This admirable society of charity sprang spontaneously from the Catholic Ladies of Oakland, and, like all such Heaven-blessed undertakings, it is doing far more good for suffering humanity than ever will be accomplished by those hypocritical heretics who think they can slay poverty with the same implement with which Samson slew a thousand Philistines—the jaw-bone of an ass.

A Catholic Hall for San Francisco.

We have heretofore intimated in these columns that it was not creditable to the Catholics of San Francisco that they possessed no building for missions or charity purposes which they could call their own. That complaint, however, is now at an end. A good step in a fair way to be founded, and in the course of a short time we hope to be able to announce that a project has been started which will give to the Catholics of this city a building that will serve for many years as a noble monument to the zeal and generosity of Archbishop Riordan and the Catholic ladies and gentlemen who may subscribe to the capital stock in the Young Men's Institute Hall Association.

The readers of the Monitor are already aware that a meeting of prominent Catholic citizens was held in this city a short time since in order to formulate plans by which land could be secured and a building suitable for a Catholic Hall erected. The meeting was a magnificent success virtually, a large sum having been subscribed to start the desirable undertaking.

The capital stock of the Young Men's Institute Hall Association is placed at $300,000 divided into 60,000 shares at the par value of $10.00 each. As any investment in real estate property in San Francisco is almost certain to return good dividends, it is to be hoped that the thousands of wealthy Catholics residing in different sections of the State will subscribe for shares so that the project may proceed as rapidly as possible towards consummation.

The selection of a site for the building, as well as all the details relating to the construction of the edifice and its management thereafter, has been entrusted to a Board of Directors comprising amongst others

Most Rev. P. W. Riordan, Rev. George Montgomery, Rev. John E. Cuttle, John J. McDade, F. S. Wensinger, J. J. O'Brien, E. W. McCarthy, James A. McMahon, Peter Donahue, Col. Robert Table, James D. Phelan, J. Mortimer Dunphy, James R. Kelly, M. C. Hassett, A. H. Loughborough, M. W. Pinche, Louis S. Kaat, Hon. J. F. Sullivan, A. R. Maguire, Gustave Touchard, Joseph Pendt, M. D., F. R. Kane, M. D., D. Geary, P. F. Nolan, and John A. Lennon.

The sentimental, social and commercial standing of these gentlemen are sufficient guarantees that the best interests of the stock-holders will be protected and promoted in every way, and those who invest have thereby an implied security for the safety of their investments. For these cogent reasons, therefore, we hope that an immediate and a liberal response will be given to the call which will be made upon Catholics who have cash to spare for such a laudable investment, and we also urge upon the members of the Young Men's Institutes scattered all over the State, to exert themselves to the utmost in order to have all the capital stock taken, so that an eligible site for their building can be secured are every available location for such an edifice is appropriated by other organizations or individuals. Besides, real estate in desirable localities in this city is advancing in value by leaps and bounds, and the sooner the project is put in motion the better will it be for all concerned.

Catholics have laid foundations now in process of erection, as well as in the prospect of a much greater and the prosperous condition of commerce.

"Delays are dangerous" to all projects involving an outlay of half a million of dollars, especially where the money has to come from a multitude of people. "Strike while the iron is hot" always holds good in an enterprise of this character, hence we sincerely hope that the Catholics of California will not let the present year pass without assisting to secure a Hall wherein Catholic young men may feel at home, and, at the same time, be safely removed from the sinful snares which society permits to exist in every direction in this city for the temptation of youth and the ultimate destruction of virtue and health in the growing males and females of San Francisco.

Intending subscribers to the capital stock can procure any information they desire by addressing any member of the Board of Directors.

The Effect of Godless Education.

It is gratifying to notice the candor with which the respectable section of the secular press is beginning to acknowledge the injurious results of education without God. The New York Evening Post truthfully says in this regard, that both filthy books and filthy newspapers find their prosperity to the existence and rapid growth in all countries of an immense public which has acquired the art of reading without any intellectual taste or culture, and therefore seeks from the types simple entertainment of any kind. He would be a very wise man who could tell how this class is to be cut off from what it finds the cheapest form of excitement." Yes, it will take many centuries to restore the tone of morality in the world, and it can only be done by godly education upon the lines laid out for it by the Church centuries ago, and those despots that the head, the heart, the mind and the soul—must all be illuminated with that light which spiritualizes secular education, and which alone can make Christian citizens for this Republic.

—Recent advices from Ireland indicate an immense emigration from that land during the present year. A cablegram says that a tremendous exodus is expected from Ireland in the Spring, and that after March 20th ten steamers belonging to as many lines will step at Queenstown for passengers every week. Passage for a great number has already been engaged. In addition to this intelligence we may add that among the hundreds of letters received by the State Board of Trade in this city, was one from the county Carlow, in which the writer sent a list of 500 Irishmen who desired to emigrate to California. The writer says that 80,000 persons left Ireland in 1887 and that a far greater number would leave this year. Such is the result of English miseries in Ireland!

"Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates, and men decay;
Princes and lords may flourish, or may fade,
A breath can make them as a breath has made,
But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
When once destroyed, can never be supplied."

Middlesboro Money-Seeking Methodist Ministers.

Whenever the financial "cracks" of the Methodist preachers leave "a clean and handy hole," they start a commotion generally by announcing that God, the Father, and the Holy Ghost, have sent them on the pulled up pavement to collect money and start a mission. Sometimes the scheme is successful in securing funds from foolish people that it may be said that all the Methodist preachers out of the pockets of Methodist dupes who vainly imagine that Catholics and Jews can be transformed into Methodists by the power of money in the hands of Methodist preachers who, as all the world knows, are mostly sallow-anthropic clothing.

The local Methodist preachers met in this city last week, on just such a religious "racket" as we have designated. The meeting was opened by a bibical fluent from Benson, who said: "It was time to go to the Jews and show them that they need a Christ, and we must also reach out to the Catholics, and the great Methodist church should have missions in all the large cities in order to bring the Jews and Catholics into the fold."

The hypocrisy, impudence and arrogance embodied in this Methodist preacher's language is a fair simple of the brazen front current of these conspirators against God's truth. Well, indeed, did Sydney Smith portray the true, racking character of Methodism when he said of it that the elements of its composition were meanness, prevarication and fraud!

Every honest, candid-minded Protestant knows that by no possible efforts on the part of the whole legion of Methodist Bunkers from Benicia can as many California Jews and Catholics be transformed into Methodists as would fill a country preacher's pig-pen. Yet, with what appalling cant this Bishop Bazao told his brethren that the general Methodist church ought to bring the unclean Jews and the unhappy Catholics into the wolf fold of Wesley! He forgot, however, to mention the remarkably indifferent fact that John Wesley—the founder, inventor and father of Methodism, thought so little of this so-called general Methodist church—when he found himself dying—he literally jumped out of the frying pan into the fire by giving up the mythical religion represented by Methodism—not he died an Episcopalian! Every big Bazao from Benicia ought, therefore, to remember that

A little knowledge can and does
Do mischief by a desperate case!

The next speaker at this Methodist preachers pow-wow was a Rev. Simon, no relation, however of the well known Simple Simon who met a pieman going to the fair, because the preacher had the good sense to remark that "as a general rule missionary work among Catholics and Jews had not been a success. Moreover, he manifested his critical ability by advancedly brethren to "watch every Catholic priest, and to pray for the conversion of Catholics." Well, if ever the fulfillment time of the fat famine, cozy cyclopedia, and very triangular or straight pull in order to fatten the souls of the men who already fill from a large 8 vine Methodist church, then the time is now. Out of the pulled up pavement, Methodist preachers will start a mission and collect money and start a mission. This plan is so successful in securing funds from foolish people that it may be said that the Methodist preachers out of the pockets of Methodist dupes who vainly imagine that Catholics and Jews can be transformed into Methodists by the power of money in the hands of Methodist preachers who, as all the world knows, are mostly sallow-anthropic clothing.

New System of Temperance Reform.

Science has become the end of intemperance in several of the most populous countries of Europe. Science has made the gastronomists have to surrender their delicious dishes to the epidemic cases, and to frame general laws for the suppression of the hydra-headed monster. Thus, every one knows that the Maine law has been and partially successful in curtailing intemperance, but there is a High Licensed Liquor Traffic in Europe which makes those who are in authority, or in influence, to be in favor of a system of temperance reform. It is well to understand what European governments consider the best plan for practically confining the sale of liquor within certain restrictive limits.

The Parliaments of both Austria and Hungary recently passed laws for the regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquor and the sale of liquor. Duly prorated the average consumption of alcoholic liquor in Sweden was 40 pints per head per annum, but owing to legislative restrictions the consumption of intoxicants has been greatly reduced. In the Netherlands it has somewhat similar to the High License law in operation in some of the States, reduced the number of liquor shops for the sale of intoxicating liquors from 45,000 in 1881 to 27,263 in 1885.

Austria now proposes to follow in the footsteps of the Netherlands, and has proposed laws regulating the number of saloons to 1 to every 600 inhabitants. Places where liquor is sold must be closed from 9 o'clock p. m. on the days preceding Sundays and festival days, until 5 o'clock a. m. of the following working day.

Licenses are required for retailing "spirituous liquors in a pure, and undiluted state, or even in estables, except in hotels, similar houses, and in the shops of the manufacturers of liquor. The importance of this regulation will be seen when it is remarked that it applies to the wages of laborers and clerks and by such as would be ashamed to frequent recognized public houses. The supply of drink to not-married persons, even extensive qualities to those under age, is to be prohibited under heavy penalties. Drinks intended for liquor consumption off a quart and under, are to be receivable at law only in certain conditions. Habitual drunkards may be prohibited from visiting any saloon for their mental and moral good.

Such is the general outline of the proposed Bill. It may of course be difficult to apply local regulations in such a way that there can be but little doubt that its groups will universally protect the communities against the evils of drunkenness and its evil effects on the social and moral life of the American people.

Such a system would, we think, not only perhaps be more in the interests of temperance and steady decrease in the marriage rate, and only in Austria, but elsewhere. This fact, partly attributable to the increased difficulty of obtaining a livelihood, and the slender salaries, the competition has reduced wages of pay, so that the average income has led to the spectrum of profligacy, immorality and sickness, such as drunkenness and its evil effects on the social and moral life of the American people.

Such is the general outline of the proposed Bill. It may of course be difficult to apply local regulations in such a way that there can be but little doubt that its groups will universally protect the communities against the evils of drunkenness and its evil effects on the social and moral life of the American people.

A Grand Society in the Presence of a Great Pontiff.

On Sunday, the 23d inst., as we learn from our European exchanges, one of the greatest receptions that marked the Jubilee year of Leo XIII. was tendered that day. It consisted of the representatives of the Society of Jesus from France, Belgium, Germany, Spain, England and America, as well as those from Italy and Rome.

Among the prominent members of the Society present were the General Congregation of the Society of Jesus, the Superior of the Society of Jesus, the Provincial of Paris, with the Provincial of the whole Society, M. Antonin Papin, and Fonin, Belgium, Germany, Spain, England, America, Italy and Rome. All had gathered in the Pauline Chapel, and the hour had been fixed by the Presidents and Superior Generals of the Society to those committees. The address of the Holy Father was read by M. Antonin Papin, the President General of the Society. The delegates in solid regiment—a regiment of Peter Pence, and a rich album containing a list of all the Conferences in the world, more than 1,200 in number, with the names of their members also exceed 80,000.

This great Society of Charity in particular is dear to the pontiff, and the Society is grateful, and the hour he hears it in his heart and soul with illumina every word of the following beautiful discourse which the Holy Father addressed to the assembled of the Conferences of St. Vincent de Paul:

We feel a deep satisfaction, dear children, in seeing you, as we do, in this solemn assembly of the Conferences of St. Vincent de Paul, and we thank you for the sentiments which inspire them and the great desire which prompts you to have expressed to their name. It is a necessary consolation for us. We are able at this solemn time of Our Jubilee—a world of prayer and encouragement to your great Society, and to obtain the blessings which have, as you remind us, been so fitting to the Society of Jesus, and to the Church.

We know how well your Conferences have prospered, and how they have so gloriously. We are glad to acknowledge an act of charity, which, in these days, more particularly, we have to do, and we feel that it is our faith the want of being consoled by acts of charity which, in the political and distractive spirit of the time does not seem to have the power of drawing and effecting the present day not only between the members of a class, but even together in the minds of those who are of the same country, and who are children of fellowship, fraternity, and sympathy, and supplying to us the most efficacious and most fruitful of all the virtues, charity.

Yet all this you should do, with a prudence which is able to impress your minds, hearts and souls. Such, dear children, we have entered upon a full of fellowship, and we have entered upon a full of fellowship, and we have entered upon a full of fellowship, and

Farm and Home.

Caring for the Quinine Tree.

The price of quinine has been reduced from $5 an ounce to less than $1, and a dealer says that it will remain cheap hereafter. The reason is that the chinchona trees are destroyed in taking off the bark. Formerly the bark was stripped clean and the trees were left naked to bleed to death. Now as the bark is removed the tree is covered with moss; new bark forms on it, and instead of living to bear one crop of bark, they yield their bark yearly.

Curing Neuralgia.

I had neuralgia in my face for a good many years. I had used all sorts of medicine which seemed to relieve it for awhile, but it would return. Over three years ago I had the worst spell I ever had, and all remedies seemed to fail. I finally had a bowl of catalog tea made, which I knew was good to quiet the nerves. I drank the tea as hot as I could, and before bed-time I was entirely free from pain. I went to bed and kept well all night. Whenever there was a slight return I would resort to the catalog tea and it cured me. I can run out in the wind now and never think of having neuralgia.

Will Apples Pay?

A gentleman living not far from Petersburg has about ten acres mostly in apple orchard. He will sell this year over 5000 barrels of apples. He knows how to pack and ship his fruit, and having good trees, always gets the best price. He estimates his income from apples alone this year at $1000 per acre. What other crop will pay better? But suppose an argument's sake his crop would only bring him one-fifth of this sum—it would still pay better than grain or potatoes. When men say that apples properly selected and cultivated will not pay, they don't stop to consider. An old apple grower informs us that they will pay even if the crop has to be sold for an average of 25 cents a box.—Petersburg Courier.

Pain as Tonics.

Pain, especially those which are of easy digestion, like cod-liver oil and cream, are essential to the well-being of the nervous system. The physiologist and neurotic-fused in all nervous structures contains fat as an essential constituent. It is remarkable that most "nervous" individuals have a strong aversion to fats as articles of diet. This is unfortunate for the omission of fats and oils from the diet results in increased irritability and weakness. Cod-liver oil is a most valuable medicine in such cases, because it is already fully digested by admixture with the bile secreted by the liver of the fish, and thus enters circuit with more easy of absorption. The labor of digestion is thus partly taken away from the tasks to be performed by the intestine. Of course, the fishy odor is objectionable at first, but this is generally overcome after a short time. There are a few preparations on the market in which oil of some kind has been partially digested by admixture with pepsin. The taste of these made are palatable, but much more expensive than the crude oil.

Chronic Tea-Poisoning.

Dr Bullard gives, in the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal, the details of seventy-four cases of chronic tea intoxication investigated by him. His conclusions are that the action of tea is cumulative; its action is more pronounced on the young and on those subject to nervous or physical depression, although persons otherwise healthy do occasionally show toxic symptoms; the average amount of the beverage required to produce poisonous effects in persons accustomed to its general use is little less than five cups per day. Chronic tea-poisoning, Dr. Bullard asserts, is a common affection, the symptoms being usually loss of appetite, dyspepsia, palpitation, headache, vomiting and nausea, and the symptoms combined with various kinds of functional nerve affections, such as neuralgia, hysteria, etc. Constipation and pain in the left side are frequent.

Child Training—The Science in a Nutshell.

How to combine firmness and love with wisdom and impartiality in the question of questions in child-training. A Detroit bachelor has embodied it in his aphorism, and gives to the world the cardinal points in his great scheme:

1. When you consent, consent cheerfully.
2. When you refuse, refuse finally.
3. Often command.
4. Never scold.
5. Beware of making an issue with your child, but when an issue is forced carry it out. It is with children as with men, few of whom, says Goethe, are open to conviction, but the majority of whom are open to persuasion.

Newspapers in the Family.

A child beginning to read becomes delighted with newspapers because he reads of names and things which are very familiar, and will make progress accordingly. A newspaper in the family one year is worth a half-year's schooling to the children, and every father must consider that educational information is connected with this advancement. The mother, having more immediate charge of a family, should herself be instructed. A mind occupied is fortified against the ills of life, and is bound for its emergencies. Children amused by reading are kindly are, of course, docile and easily governed. How many thoughtless young men have spent their earnings in a grog-shop who ought to have been reading! How many parents who have never spent twenty dollars or books or papers, would gladly give the hands to reclaim a son or daughter who is ignorantly and thoughtlessly fallen into temptation.

Wholesomeness of Apples as Food.

The great Chemist, Liebig, said on this subject: The importance of apples as food has not, hitherto, been sufficiently estimated or understood. Besides containing a large proportion of sugar, albumen, and other nutritive compounds in the form of food, they contain such a fine combination of vegetable acids, extractive substance, and aromatic principles as to act powerfully in the capacity of refrigerants, tonics and antiseptics; and when freely used at the season of ripeness by young and aged, and others, they probably maintain and strengthen the power of productive labor.

On His Guard.

Maiden (watching geese in distance)—Even the birds seem to be happier running in couples!

He (a bachelor suddenly remembering it is leap year)—Yes, mine, but then they are only geese, and know no better!

Family Fun.

(WRITTEN FOR FAMILY FUN.)

THE CARPET-LAYER'S REVERIE.

We are placed in a world of trouble,
With ARMS BUT HAVE NO HEAD;
And our lives are very much
Changed and submerged
Like carpet-patterns mixed.

There is little room for creeping
From the floor to the ceiling line,
For our lives are lain
Close as lambs,
With connecting stitches tied.

And after the weary struggle,
When we've lived our briefer day,
The needle of death
Will stitch each breath,
And our carpet is ready to lay.

And those who court delusions,
And fashions fancies hug,
In the end but feel
They are sewed
As the cat on the parlor rug!

And Truth comes down with a heavy hand
To stitch our fancies much;
And we writhe and reel,
As when cold steel
Hits flat on our balancing thumb!

There are threes in the fairest roses,
For woe is of joy begotten;
Though the thorn's not seen
The thorn I ween,
Like a tenacious tack is cotton,

And many who boast of honest lives,
(Ah! Life is the deepest riddle,)
Are not just right
In a good, strong light,
But like carpets that hulps in the middle.

Winering the Bishop.

A Catholic Bishop gave one of his priests in a rural district of Australia the serviceable gift of a horse. To commemorate the circumstance the young priest named the animal after the donor, and "Saddle the Bishop," "Feed the Bishop," "Water the Bishop," and so forth became familiar phrases in his household. Some time afterward the children of the parochial schools were ready for confirmation, and a day was fixed by the diocesan to confer this sacrament of the Catholic Church upon them. The priest, who was the soul of hospitality, invited the principal official persons in the district to meet the prelate at dinner after the ceremony. It was a gathering day in the Australian wilderness, and just as the distinguished company sat down to table the door opened slowly, and the priest's groom put his head into the room and whispered:

"Might I have a word with your reverence?"

"Oh, not now, Mike, don't you see that I'm engaged with his lordship! Come to me after dinner."

The prelate considerately suggested that Michael should be heard on the spot.

"Well, Mike, his lordship will permit you to tell what you want at once."

"It's a horrid hot day, your reverence; I was thinking whether I oughtn't to throw a bucket of water on the Bishop?"

Touched a Responsive Chord.

"Oh, brethren," shouted a temperance orator, "let us build high the fences about our houses, and shut out from our country the baleful liquor traffic. Now is the time to put up the bars and—

"Might you not, sir," piped a man in the crowd; "I've put up one in my grocery, and you ought to put up another as soon as I can get the fixtures."

It Brings Good Luck.

In the Domestic Circle.

Husband—Here you heard the pretty little expression regarding visits paid by young ladies to Mrs. Cleveland at the White House?

Wife—What is it?

Husband—It brings them luck.

Wife—How?

Husband—They always get married.

Wife—Ugh! You call that luck, do you!

Not Bargain Day There.

"I know I am not a match for you in wealth or in social position," he said. I know how unworthy I am of you, yet may I not hope that perhaps some time—some day—"

"Yes," she assented, lifting her regal head. "Some day as you justly remark, I may be glad to consider your proposition. But not I think in the near future. No Mr. Secondshelf, it is not bargain day at this counter yet."

When They Rush Things.

"Your dotion must be somewhat monotonous," said a lady to a mailing clerk.

"They are indeed."

"The same round day after day and week after week. No sentiment.

"No sentiment excepting when we have to rush things."

"And when is that?"

"Oh! when we find 'in haste' written on the outside of a letter."

"Oh! yes, that creates sentiment!"

"Tremendous!"

A SAD CALAMITY.

Great Loss of Life by a Steamboat Explosion.

One of the worst steamboat explosions that ever occurred on this coast wrecked the Southern Pacific Company's steamer Delta, at South Vallejo, Monday morning, and resulted in the killing or injuring of every one of the forty nine persons on board. Fifteen bodies have been recovered and identified, and fourteen persons are missing, all of whom are believed to be lying dead among the wreckage of the ill fated steamer. Most of the killed and injured were workingmen going from Vallejo to the Contra Costa shore to their daily labor in the mills and factories at the Junction. The explosion occurred just as the steamer was about to start from the wharf. The Julia was broken in two, the crude petroleum used for fuel took fire, the vessel soon burned to the water's edge, and the flames spread to the adjoining wharf, burning the offices and four cars. Starr's flour mill was saved with difficulty. The entire loss is estimated at $200,000.

The saddest feature of the disaster was the grief of those who lost husbands and fathers. The identification of the recovered bodies was attended by terrible scenes. None of the survivors could give any clue to the cause of the explosion, but late last night a diver started the mystery by discovering one boiler with the end blown clean out, while the petroleum tanks were found to be intact. The Julia was an old boat, built in 1861, and the boilers, though frequently overhauled, were never renewed. They were inspected last June and declared to be sound.

List of the Victims of the Explosion.

VALLEJO, February 27.—At this Coroner's inquest this afternoon thirteen bodies were identified. From the result of the inquest and from other sources the following is a complete list of the killed:

John Brancato—Laborer, 36 years old, native of Ireland; leaves a wife and two children.

Michael Brannelay—Laborer in a lumber yard, 27 years old, native of Ireland; leaves his mother and a wife who is in the insane asylum.

John Braverie—A Norwegian employed in a lumber yard, 30 years old, single.

Timothy Cain—Mill hand in Starr's mill, native of Ireland, 40 years old; leaves a wife and two children.

William Connelly—Laborer 52 years old; leaves a wife and two children.

Joseph Dufour—Assistant pilot of the Julia, 50 years old; leaves a wife and five children.

Michael Higgins—Worked at the sculpin works, about 40 years old; leaves a wife and two children.

Malvin Hodgkins—Tally man for Port Costa Lumber Co., native of Maine, 31 years old; leaves a young wife.

William Lennox—Shipping clerk, 27 years old; leaves a wife and two children.

Albert Mathiesen—Laborer at lumber yards, native of Norway, 43 years old; single; a member of the imperial Order of Red Men.

Olof Nelsen—Fisherman, native of Norway, 28 years old; single.

Edward Rule—Apprentice-molder, native of California, 20 years old; single.

James Sale—Workman in lumber yard, body not yet recovered; leaves a nearly above, native of California, 33 years old; single.

Theodore Stark—A machinist from Massachusetts, 44 years old; leaves a wife but no children.

Timothy Kane, laborer. His body was recognized by a porous plaster on the side, the poor fellow's wife having put it on the night before for him. His head was simply a charred mass, black and unrecognizable.

CABLEGRAMS FROM IRELAND.

Victorious Tenants.

DUBLIN, February 23.—The victory of tenants on the Ponsonby estate at Inagh has been unexpectedly resumed. A large bailiff and police force, accompanied by a doctor, an ambulance and a fire-engine, escorted the bailiffs.

An Editor's Sentence Set Aside.

DUBLIN, February 22.—The Exchequer Court has set aside the sentence of two months' imprisonment passed by the Crimes Court in the case of Walsh, editor of the Wexford People, on the ground of its holding of assemblies, and as a natural consequence of these was seen deliberations in the affairs of Government.

EUROPEAN GOVERNMENTS.

The order next entered upon the subject of European Governments. He said where civilization on that continent was making its greatest strides, the Catholic religion was proclaimed. As far as it lay in the power of the Church, every monarch was made to rule with justice. In England, during the ascendency of the Catholic Church, liberty had a healthy growth, and on event of paramount importance was the granting by King John of the charter to the barons. This charter was the ground-work upon which was reared the structure of British liberty. The speaker referred to the anti-papal of the Republics of San Marino and Andora, and attributed the fact of their permanency to the influence of the Catholic Church. Switzerland was distinguished as were also Venice, Florence, Genoa, Pisa and other Italian cities. Everything tend ed to show that during the ascendency of the Catholic religion there was a healthy tendency toward Republican forms of Government. France was the oldest daughter of the Church, and when she assumed a Republican form of Government, she found no reason of the Church upon her. The speaker said that in the discussion of the subject it was necessary to call attention largely to the Governments of Europe, for there could be traced the evolution of civilization from barbarism.

SOUTH AMERICAN REPUBLICS.

The speaker called attention to the fact that nearly all the governments of South America were Republican, and he pointed out that the Catholic religion had its largest and most exclusively. He denied that the Church had ever done anything to oppose religious liberty. In the War of Independence the Catholics joined in heartily with the Colonists, giving their blood and substance in aid of the cause. Referring to the ministry of the Church he said the Papal Nuncio or legate had they combined religion and politics. They took no part in the coronation at the polls and accepted no offices. The speaker quoted from Washington's farewell address to the effect that religion and morality are indispensable to political prosperity in any nation. "Let us not indulge in the belief that religion can be sustained without morality; this is the necessary spring of government. If moral restraint were lacking there would be power that could prevent men from giving rein to their desires." In conclusion the speaker said that the institute of which he was a member, owed no apology to the State for its Catholicism, and argued that Catholics made good citizens and had the welfare of the Republic at heart.

TRUTH WELL TOLD.

Judge Sullivan's Late Lecture

HISTORICAL FACTS FORCIBLY STATED.

The Relation of Catholicity to the Republic.

Weber Hall, Stockton, was filled last Wednesday night, the occasion being an entertainment given under the auspices of the Young Men's Institute No. 6, to defray the expenses of the State session of the Institute which convenes in this city next Fall. The drawing feature of the entertainment was an oration by Judge Sullivan of San Francisco. The programme opened with a duet, violin and piano, a selection from "Il Trovatore" by Miss Anna Tully and Gus Grant. The President of the Institute, John T. Doyle was down on the programme for an address but gave way as he expressed it, for "things more interesting." Misses May and Ida Dohrman danced the flag dance in a manner neat and graceful. A vocal duet, "Pescatori, by Misses Amy and Carrie Hoyt, was finely rendered and the young ladies effort called forth an encore; Miss Carrie Marks gave a recitation entitled, "The Miner," in her best style. Beach Hornsby's sweet little tot, danced gracefully and kept good time for one so young. She was recalled and sang "Going Back to Dixie." Charles E. Dahlman sang an appropriate song, "Down Deep Within the Cellar," in his rich bass voice and was encored. Misses Anita and Marie Vinat gave a duet, harp and piano, entitled "La Concertina." Miss Mercy Webster gave a very good selection and Miss Anita Tully rendered the "Shillelagh Dance" on the piano. A scene from "Old School for Scandal" was portrayed by Miss A. M. Haines and R. H. Gillham.

JUDGE SULLIVAN'S ADDRESS.

Judge J. F. Sullivan of San Francisco was introduced and delivered an address entitled, "Are American Catholics a Menace to the Republic?" He apologized for using manuscripts, saying that his other duties prevented him from devoting ample time to his lecture. He has a pleasant voice, and an earnest, frank manner, which gives his discourse a greater charm than any green to avowal from rhetoric or elocution, and his language is as plain and direct as it needs not the aid of gestures to render it effective. His address, of which only a brief synopsis can be given, showed studious thought and logical definitess, scholarship refined by a bright intellect. He paid a brief tribute to the memory of Washington, saying the monument of the Illustrious warrior and statesman was as broad as the continent itself.

The Judge then announced his subject, and said the large evangelical figures showed that in the United States there were up wards of 7,000,000 Catholics, and the membership was exceeded by no other denomination. The membership of the Catholic Church throughout the world was nearly one-half of that of the other Christian denominations combined. Some years ago a Frenchman visited this country, and upon his return home published a book, devoting therein a chapter to Catholicism in the United States, in which he stated that the country was the most democratic of any nation. It was also the country in which the Catholic religion made the greatest advances. The promotion of his assertions he demonstrated by statistics.

CATHOLICS AS CITIZENS.

The speaker said it was frequently asserted that Catholics could not make good and true citizens of a Republic. As a matter of fact, Catholics did not fare worse at the Government more than another. None of their brethren, or ordered catechism related, or favored, a particular form of Government, but the Catholic Church honored the laws, giving care upon every form of Government. He cited Montalembert's first pro test against the heart of the continent, and Marquette was only one of the many Missionaries who went forth to convert the heathen, and no color or skin ever repelled their advance.

It was an American Archbishop who said the Catholics were of no land or school of men, but broke the barriers of race, and its views were as extended as the world. The organization of the Catholic Church was based upon the principle of equal rights to all, and no man was denied its sacraments. Recruits for that ministry came from all classes—many of them from the poorest. With her "throne and shame from no condition rose." The Catholic Church encouraged the holding of assemblies, and as a natural consequence of these was seen deliberations in the affairs of Government.

EUROPEAN GOVERNMENTS.

The orator next entered upon the subject of European Governments. He said where civilization on that continent was making its greatest strides, the Catholic religion was proclaimed. As far as it lay in the power of the Church, every monarch was made to rule with justice. In England, during the ascendency of the Catholic Church, liberty had a healthy growth, and one event of paramount importance was the granting by King John of the charter to the barons. He denied that the Church had ever done anything to oppose religious liberty. In the War of Independence the Catholics joined in heartily with the Colonists, giving their blood and substance in aid of the cause. Referring to the ministry of the Church he said it was neither clergy, Italian Premier, who wished to make a demonstration against France.

Our Released from Prison.

LEWISTON, Feb. 29.—Gen. Comyn, Premier of Parliament, sentenced to one month's imprisonment for contempt of Parliament, was released today. Cox made a speech to a crowd denouncing Chief Secretary Balfour and maintaining that the National League was stronger than ever. He was afterward presented with numerous ad dresses.

NOT A JESUIT MAXIM

A Protestant Parson Converted.

THE END DOES NOT JUSTIFY THE MEANS.

Bishop Chatard Exposes a Preacher's Ignorance.

The following letter appeared recently in the Indianapolis Journal:

BISHOP CHATARD AND THE JESUITS

To the Editor of the Indianapolis Journal:

Some time ago you published a letter from Bishop Gross, of Western New York, in which he said that if you would publish any thing you will publish the other side, I now give you the opportunity. The letter was addressed to the Ministers, a church periodical of New-York City.

"Fr. Ignatius Author of the Charbonnas

"A little more than a year since I had occasion to quote the Jesuit maxim, "the end justifies the means." Whatever is one of the Jesuit Morals interest the following has made in one of our local journals of largest circulation: "If Bishop Cox can show from the authorities of the Church and the writers of the Society of Jesus that the Jesuits teach the principle that the end justifies the means, he shall receive the reward of $1,000, payable at Cannons College, this city.

This was impolitely answered by the Bishop of Buffalo, thus: "Unless they were willing to spell it to one of our benighted Protestants, I refer them for proof to the Encyclopedia Britannica, Vol. XIII., p. 1, where they will be found textual quotations from the Jesuit writers (Bonembaum, Layman and Wagemann), fully meeting the challenge. The article quotes from one of them as follows: "Finis determinat quidlicet ex medis. Thus spoke the Jesuits officially, but, needless to say, the reward was not paid. The Jesuits contented themselves with replying that the maxim does not mean that "the end justifies bad means. Answer. Hence means require no justification. I had accepted their challenge and given a responsible reference to which they body has access. It would be easy to give other cases, but how can any fair Protestant Enough? It illustrates their maxim that if you are quoted, through the newspapers statements that "the Bishop had never met their challenge. I wrote this only to gratify my friends who have inquired of me as to the facts.

"A. CLEVELAND COXE,

"Bishop of Western New York."

Had the master owned no comment I should not have called your attention to the facts in the matter and asked for the publication of this above.

F. W. HENRY,

Rector of Grace church, Muncie, Ind.

BISHOP CHATARD'S REPLY.

In reply to the above Rt. Rev. Bishop Chatard writing to the Journal says:

"Your issue of January 12th contains a communication signed by F. W. Henry, Rector of Grace church, Muncie," in which there is contained a very extraordinary letter from the Rt. Rev. A. Cleveland Coxe, Bishop of Western New York. Were it not that the Bishop of Buffalo had for by the Rev. Mr. Henry, and that I know something of Bishop Coxe, I should have hesitated to look upon such documents as coming from one of his standing. Some thirty-three years ago he was rector of a large church, in Buffalo, and gratified his feeling of hostility to the Catholic Church by a violent attack on Archbishop Hughes, Coadjutor of the Immaculate Conception, which tangled that the Bishop of Buffalo was obliged to interpose in a letter to the Bishop of Buffalo, in which he said that "the Jesuits teach the principle that the end justifies the means." Bishop Coxe was thirty years a professed Nun, and up to a few years ago was his episcopal title as a teacher in the convent schools.

On Jan. 23d, Mr. P. Ferriter, of Hagle, was elected from Tralee, in place of P. W. Henry, deceased for a seat with had labor, for an alleged assault on a policeman.

Limerick.

Mr. H. O. Gill, M. P. for Limerick city, has addressed a letter to the Mayor to intention to resign his seat on account of his inability to attend to his parliamentary engagements. The Mayor of Limerick has forwarded to Mr. Dillon, M. P., £1,000 as the first instalment of the city and country to the Parnell Tribute Fund.

Longford.

Mr. John Gleason, of Longford, died Jan. 30th Mr. Gleason, who was literary years connected with the Cork City Middle Times, and who is entitled to the credit of suppression in Ireland of the Phoenix Society, contributed to Irish journals a number of interesting papers on the Irish Volunteers. The deceased gentleman was a brother of the Rev. Canon Gleason, of Longford, and of Mr. Gleason, of Dublin, and of Mr. Gleason, of Dublin, and of Mr. Gleason, of Dublin

Poetry.

[FOR THE MONITOR.]

GOOD FOOD.

I have sometimes thought when to my door
Came one of God's neglected poor,
Or when at the curb of the crowded street
A lame limb begged me to lend his feet,
Loss or sick, or maimed or blind—
That Heaven to them had been unkind.

But I thought of the fate to wealth oft given:
'Few that are rich shall enter Heaven.'
Needful pride and selfish greed
Are curbed by the Master's simple creed;
And a deed of love done Christ will hail
As either for him or for a saint.

A cloaked life and spirit pure
Are treasures fashioned to endure:
But the rich who boast no1 odious sad board,
Not let a bigger share their board—
God help them! they need pity more,
Than the wretch who kneels at their kitchen-door:

For the poor may suffer, starve and die,
But what is death to eternity?
Why Christ himself had humblest birth,
Every pledge to Him in death was given;
So the weak and wretched of this earth
May can day be while saints in Heaven.

Who is poorest? Who, I ask, is rich?
The selfish, aimless, purse-proud rich,
Or the humble, tattered beggar—which?

THE CONTRITE HEART

With humble heart, the sin-burdened soul
To Jesus' feet
Cries, "Have mercy, Lord!"
With modest mien, befitting Heaven's throne,
Grants my exceptional sight.

I humbly bend while in my soul I feel
A gentle calmness creep;
My heart now tells that in her mystic dells,
The fountain of sorrow lies.

In bitter anguish beat—for in 'tis Lost—
I prayed for grace above;
For heavenly light, shining pure and bright,
On the face of Eternal Love.

While thus I knelt, within my heart I felt
The touch of comfortless's hand,
Then I saw the gleam of God's dark night,
At Heaven's strong command.

I thanked the Virgin-maid, and the heaven-born child,
Who asked of God eternal
To pleace my heart, with the pain of sorrow's dead,
To regain his grace eternal.

Ah! what a bliss to taste of joy like this,
That streams from God above;
That pretty glides, and in the heart abides—
Sweet token of His love.

Ah! blessed pensive, wilfully sorgie lasses,
Then heal the sin-stained soul;
And even again make it as it was,
Of heavenly thoughts—the soul.

Oh! from in solo desert, for you the low crowned heart
Wanders to pitiful, it tend,
And turns with love to heights above
When religion is the end.

With sorrowful prayer As I endure

STAR MUSINGS.

I wonder if the great, white stars
Vouchsafed to heaven above,
Are made by God set in the sky
To light the earth with love?

Or are they wistful unshed mortal tears
Their fields with pearl-set—
To mean the many-colored light
That dying in the West,

To records of forgotten days
Still burning near the Blest,
Shine guidingly upon the path
That leads to heavenly rest?

Then faintly beam yo silent stars,
And when life's last scan—
Like twinkling stars—a gleaming star the sun,
Oh! guide our souls to heaven!

THE MAGDALEN.

Though low be her couch and base her name,
Scarlem in sorrow and laden with shame;
Calmly she's sleeping her last long sleep,
With not a friend by her low to weep.
Pale is her features, once Parkly's bride—
A daughter of Eve, she fell in her pride.
Judge not the error, but utter a prayer,
Think of her lonely—so full and so fair!
Pity must weep o'er her, lying so low!
For sorrow in life never made her a foe;
But now sorrow and pity will shed her good name,
And blemished for ever a women's best fame.

Few women on her their beauty had shed,
For trials were laid on that fair young head;
Quickly the bright dreams of youth were o'er,
And vanished the joys that could some so more.
With shame on her cheek and despair at her heart,
And a conscience to wound with its maddening smart,

Truly her life was a long day of pain,
Drooping in gladness, in sorrow in some.
Look at her lying so pale and so still,
Who would believe she have sight of ill;
Oh! speak of her not in scorn of shame,
Try to forget—to forgive—her sorrow and shame!

Has she a father to mourn her lon now?
Has she a fond mother who kissed her brow?
Gone on her immortal, not with disdain,
For Death is his triumph has wiped out all stain.
Look at her lips, how sweetly they part,
Breathing that odes which rings from the heart.
Surely repentance has been the blest dower,
Which came to the fallen one in her last hour.

THE LEGEND OF THE MOSS-ROSE.

Children, have you heard the story,
That the little moss-rose tells,
Of the time it bloomed in glory,
On the hill-top, in the dells?

But it wanted special favor;
Other roses were as bright,
Others had as sweet a savor,
And were lovely to the sight.

So it went to its Creator,
Lifting up its pretty head:
"O my Master, give, oh, give me,
Something more than these!" it said.

And the Master heard, and smiling,
Answered, "Yes, I'll give to thee
Only moss, on earth that creepeth,
Emblem of humility."

John Selwyn's Daughters.

An Episode in Real Life

John Selwyn was a strong man, for he had manoeuvered his strength. He relied and caught at the chair, and for the moment there was no light in his eyes. He had asked for the truth, but merciful Father. For a space he covered his face with his hands, and the silence in the room was as the silence of death. When he raised his head, there was a quiet smile on his face.

"How long before"—the voice died in the parched throat.

The great man looked at him pityingly, even his professional callousness penetrated.

"I am sorry to say, Mr. Selwyn, that think the utmost limit is two years, but there is imminent danger within that period. Yes," he continued, profession trampling pity, "it is more than possible that work would bring on a crisis in less than a twelve-month. I shall recommend an absolute cessation from labor as an imperative necessity."

John Selwyn's tortured heart forced one terrible cry, and he arose and listened to hard the man who had told him his fate with hands contracted in a helpless, imploring fashion, as though the doom were already upon him.

"Doctor, Doctor," he cried out, "you have made a mistake. Say there was one hopeful symptom you have overlooked—the God of mercy. I cannot die in this way. I have only been trying my hoarest endurance. I have it in me, I know I know you remember I have a wife and children waiting for bread. Oh, I cannot have it true!"

The surgeon put his cool, steady hand upon Selwyn's shoulders. "I am very sorry, sorry from my heart," he said with genuine feeling, "but it is God alone who can help you. He is man, Selwyn, and try to endure the inevitable."

"Why, John," said the wife, "do not say that."

"Hush!" cried the girls in indignant, loving disclaim "dear, dearest, and best of papas. You know you always did the very best."

So he had. John Selwyn was a well-known surgeon—a man whose services were always in requisition. The eldest of a large family, he had supported mother and sisters until the first had been called home and the latter had married. His wife had managed well with the required income. Her girls had got a smack of making a little go very far not often possessed by girls of 16 and 17. They had received excellent educations, but neither had displayed more than ordinary proficiency. In short, they were admirable types of the ordinary American girl, quick-witted, generous, clever, but not too clever. Mrs. Selwyn had noted with some regret that Gertrude and Bryan were rather in different to what are usually termed feminine accomplishments, although fairly well skilled in them.

Gertrude devoted herself to her father, and openly declared her intention of becoming a surveyor, and, indeed was an invaluable assistant to him. Bryan never evinced a desire to do more than help her brothers, knowing he must stand helpless and let them starve. He wandered around the streets, pawing his acquaintances unheedingly, till the darkness fell. Then mankind said—"He a man. Have the impudence! Remember you are driving them wild with anxiety."

He entered his gate. The windows were unscreened, the bright light displayed the shoen of silver and chins. He saw his wife's face been over that blessed face. Yes, he had remembered his strength. He relied and caught at the chair, and for the moment there was no light in his eyes. He had asked for the truth, but merciful Father. For a space he covered his face with his hands, and the silence in the room was as the silence of death. When he raised his head, there was a quiet smile on his face.

THE MONITOR.

THIRTY-FIRST YEAR OF PUBLICATION.

THE MONITOR has the largest circulation of any Religious Paper published on the Pacific Coast.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 7, 1888.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

— Justin McCarthy has been offered the position of Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons.

— A subscription from Ireland reports the death of Right Rev. James Walshe, D. D., Bishop of Kildare and Leighlin. He was consecrated March 30th, 1856, and died on Sunday last. R. I. P.

— Miss Cleveland is said to be writing the life of St. Augustine. Rather an ambitious undertaking for a non-Catholic, but we hope the doctrines of St. Augustine may lead her to the light of true faith.

— The snow has been so deep in the Alps this year that a snow-slider covered the celebrated Hospice of St. Bernard, and the residence of the monks, but fortunately no lives were sacrificed.

— Rev. Augustine Deshon, of Indiana, in the Episcopal Congress of Louisville, declared that Protestantism was a "mule" without pride of ancestry or hope of posterity. Bis in unde.

— The Baptists are claiming for a change of name. In their new Bible the word "Baptism" nowhere appears; and their new motto reads, "one Lord; one Faith; one Immersion." As they wish to be nothing if not scriptural, they propose to style themselves hereafter "Immersionists."

— Last Sunday was the 110th anniversary of the birth of Robert Emmes, a hero whose noble struggle for Ireland's liberty has kept the fire of patriotism brightly burning in many an Irish breast throughout the past century and in every land wherein the spirit of liberty exists throughout the whole world.

— St. Patrick's Day is to be made the occasion this year in London of a political demonstration in favor of Home Rule of a more and more extensive and representative character which have hitherto been held on this anniversary. Although the Irish spectacle will not be heard inside the walls of Parliament so much this session, it will be heard of a good deal out of doors.

— We are now in Lent, and as a pious writer properly remarks: "As regards the sinner and balm, which are the world in the very height of its power to do harm, no one that calls himself a disciple of Christ should ever be present at them, unless necessity or the position he holds in society obliges him, but if from his own free choice he throws himself amidst such dangers during the present holy season of penance and recollection, he offers an insult to his character, and must needs cease to believe that he has sin to atone for, and a God to pacify by communication from the City Collector of Chicago, Mr. W. J. Onahan, concerning the success of the High License law. It is true that it furnishes a conclusive answer to the extreme statements which prohibition advocates have been accustomed to make during the last two months, their aim being to show that the number of saloons and of arrests for drunkenness had greatly increased during the past year. In this case, as in others, reports of the failure of High License laws are shown to be not upon misrepresentation and misinformation.

— A cablegram from Rome, dated Friday last, says: "To-day was celebrated at the anniversary of the coronation of the Pope. His Holiness received the congratulations of the Sacred College, Cardinal Secretary, Dean of the College, delivered the address. Pope replied in an animated speech. He continued more than ever on his position, which he said was untenable. He declared that if the Italian Government did not provide jubilee fêtes, it was in its own interest that it acted, and no doubt Mr. Taylor's respect for the Holy See. The Catholic world must be aware of the situation. No arrangement with the Government was possible until the independence of the Papacy was restored.

— A private letter from Rome announces Rev. Dr. John S. Foley, pastor of St. Martin's Church, Baltimore, is looked upon there as the next Bishop of Detroit. The clergy of that diocese have, according to the writer of that letter, forwarded a unanimous request that Dr. Foley be appointed to the See—a rare compliment—he adds, to a clergyman in another diocese, and one that seldom fails to have its weight of influence at the Vatican. Dr. Foley has the hearty indorsement of the American Hierarchy. He is eminently qualified for the proposed honor, being a ripe scholar, a fluent and eloquent speaker, and possessing marked administrative abilities. Dr. Foley is a man of handsome physical presence, and is in every way fitted to wear the purple. We says the Baltimore Mirror.

— The Young Men's Catholic Association, of Boston College, like the Young Men's Institute of this State, have decided to undertake the erection, in that city, of a large building, to be used for all the purposes of a literary and social institute for the Catholic young men. The plans have been laid with care and deliberation, and active work is already begun in the way of providing necessary funds. The work is a notable one, and it will be well and nobly accomplished. Sites for such buildings are becoming scarce in large cities, and, as we hinted last week, no time should be lost in securing land even if the erection of the building has to be postponed for future years. Mother's Best Estate Circular of last week thus speaks of the advance of real estate in this city: "The tendency of real estate is to advance in prices all along the line. This is particularly true of all funds business property. No less than of that class of real estate which is not yet business property, but will inevitably be so five to fifteen years hence."

Some Note for a Rev. Taylor to Crack.

The Riverside Daily Ink imparts the important information to its readers that an Episcopal preacher delivered the alpha lactical application of Rev. R. W. B. Taylor, preached on a recent Sunday concerning the difference between the real unanimous Catholic or pronunciamento, issued by Christ and the Apostles, and the Roman Catholic Church, as comparatively a modern organization. Now, Mr. Taylor says these different designated churches form only one "Catholic Church, less is that the Roman Church, the Greek Church and the Eastern Church, all refuse to embrace with or many say to recognize, the Church of England! They feel flattered our Mr. Taylor's sect as completely as if it were a twice turned flap-jack.

Now we propose to relieve Mr. Taylor of course, each of these points, in order to show Mr. Taylor that his sectarian theories have not even a timber toe to fasten upon. His before doing so we may as well enlighten Mr. Taylor's congregation upon points, viz. Mr. Taylor's Unadulled of theology is neither original nor truthful. The "differences" he notes have all been knocked into smithereens by many Catholic writers during the present century.

All sensible Christian men agree that Christ founded one Church—and no more. This one Blessed Saviour did when He said to St. Peter, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build My Church. (Matt. xvi. 18). Christ always and everywhere speaks of His Church, never of "Its churches." St. Peter—upon whom Christ built His Church, was first Bishop of Rome and first Pontiff of the Catholic Church, thus we Catholics prove her title to be the one, holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church against which neither the hateful fabricators of heresies, nor the gates of hell even, shall ever prevail. Thus knocks the underpinning from beneath Mr. Taylor's tapped building.

PAPAL INFALLIBILITY.—Infallibility is one of the most necessary factors in the visible Church of God, and without it no Church can claim to be the true Church. Almighty God gave to St. Peter the power of "binding and binding." He also promised to abide with His Church to the end of time, and it is through the influence of the Holy Ghost guiding and enlightening them that—out of over 250 Popes—not a single Pontiff of the Catholic Church ever advanced or advocated a heretical doctrine. An infallible Church must have an infallible head in all matters concerning faith and morals—whilst a mere man-made sect can accept as Christian verities from an immoral King like Henry VIII., or a leaver-swilling sot like Martin Luther. This disposes of "difference" No. 1.

THE WORSHIP OF SAINTS.—There is no such folly as "the worship of Saints" practised by or practised in the Catholic Church. We give worship to God—and to Him alone. We pray to the Saints to help us, and in this happy and holy custom of asking the intercession of the dwellers in every sect of which Mr. Taylor is a theological turnstile, has omitted the Catholic Church. In a hymn frequently sung in the Episcopalian churches, and entitled, "To Thee from all souls, or the saints are souls" are also invoked, and in some of the Ritualistic churches the Litany of the Ritualistic churches the Litany of the Saints form part of the High Church Episcopalian worship. But, as we said at the outset, no Catholic worships any Saint in the sense alluded to by Mr. Taylor, so that topples over "difference" No. 2.

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.—The dogma of the Immaculate Conception of Blessed Virgin has ever been a stumbling-block to sectarians. Protestants who believe that St. John the Baptist was sanctified whilst still unborn, cannot cast off their prejudices sufficiently to believe that the Mother of God was sanctified from the first moment of her conception. Mary was sinless by the grace of God. "Then art innocent," says Bossuet, addressing Christ, "by nature, Mary only by grace. Then by excellence, she only by privilege. Thou as Redeemer, she as the first of those whom Thy precious blood has purified." This is the Catholic doctrine in a nut-shell, and we leave it for Mr. Taylor to upset it if he can.

INFIDELITY.—No doubt Mr. Taylor like a great many other preachers whose only knowledge of the Catholic Church comes from perverted fabulous authors, thinks that Indulgences authorize the commission of sin. In this, however, he is egregiously mistaken. The power of the Keys, given to the Church through Peter, enables her not only to forgive sins but also to open the gates of heaven for repentant sinners. Thus St. Paul imposed penance "with the powers of the Lord Jesus," and relaxed it "in the person of Christ." Penitably so relaxed was no longer due, either here or hereafter, so that the doctrine of Indulgences exhibits at once the justice of God and His infinite mercy.

CERTAINLY.—Mr. Taylor would not be a true disciple of Henry VIII., if he did not object to Celibacy in the priesthood. Carnalism was the cornerstone of Protestantism in Luther's case, and it will continue so down to the end. The common-sense people of the world, however, are rapidly beginning to discover the difference between a divinely-ordained, disinterested and disentangled clergy, and a body of men whose attention is divided between babies and the bibbly, soothing syrup and sermonizing, bonnets and boxes, pulpit talks and prunes, plasters, sermons and Scripture, curtain lectures and Christianity. Nor has it taken the world long to discover that one Catholic priest is capable of doing more good in the world than a whole wagon-load of preachers who have wives and babies to look after, and who merely have time to work for the Lord one day in the week—the other six days being devoted entirely to Sarah Jane and the midgets who people the parsonage premises. So much on that point.

Now let us turn to Mr. Taylor's "argument" outlining his reasons for not believe-ing the Roman Catholic Church to be the true Church of Christ. Here is what he is reported as having said on that subject:

"The Catholic Church was not comprehended in any one branch; the local Church should be more right to claim universal authority than had the Church of England, or the Greek Episcopal church, but the various branches comprising the orthodox Russian, the Greek, the English, the Italian, the Eastern churches, the Dutch Episcopal, and the American Episcopal made up the Catholic Church.

We feel fully assured that the "branch" or which Mr Taylor claims make up the Catholic Church of the creation, are "eastern branches" and had tried unity. Now let us ask Mr Taylor one question which will settle the whole matter, and show the unsectarian character of the religious claim of the Episcopalians. Mr. Taylor says these different designated churches form only one "Catholic Church, less is that the Roman Church, the Greek Church and the Eastern Church, all refuse to embrace with or many say to recognize, the Church of England! They feel flattered our Mr. Taylors sect as completely as if it were a twice turned flap-jack.

The Church of England has said her lapgn "Bishops" as delegates to all the Eastern churches yet all of them said to her "Get the behind us Satan!" They one and all refused any alliance with her, because they knew too well the foul leprosy which overspread her body when she was born during the reign of Henry VIII. This is a fact and we challenge Mr Taylor to contradict it, notwithstanding all the rolling talk he recounts about "unanimous" and other spiritual myths of his public Protestant imagination.

Moreover, it is a well-established fact that among the sects of Protestantism there are several of them who turn up their heretical noses at "those other fellows," the Episcopalian persons, who pretend to be more "respectable" than American sectarians merely because they claim to have in the Anglican Church an English mother-in-law. For this reason several of the preachers of American sects do not recognize the Episcopal Church as anything more than a thing tail to Victoria's kite, and, as a consequence, they never permit Episcopalians to occupy their pulpits, nor do they ever "speak to them" by any chance. This is the statue of Mr. Taylor's 1042 sect in the eyes of both the Eastern churches and also American Protestant sects themselves.

The holy Roman Catholic church, therefore, is the only Church of God in the world. The Episcopalian sect is merely a mushroom which grew up from the fungus of the infamous English king designated by historical writers as the most corrupt character that ever disgraced the English sovereignty. He was Mr Taylor's spiritual Father-in-law, and the Mormon sinbeam pop in his defunct relation."

The "Churchman" on "Father Vilatte."

The Rev. Father Vilatte, of Wisconsin, who has been ordained and seven thousand others have entered our church, is now travelling in the East. The Church Herald and Churchman Publication, says: "He is delighted among his own people and French Roman Catholics in the Western Bishops hearing the opening of its publication.—Parish Chimes.

No doubt our Episcopalian contemporary will be astonished to learn that its "Father Vilatte of Wisconsin" and his "seven thousand converts," some of those peculiar Protestant stores filled with poison and falsehood in order to injure the Catholic Church.

In 1885 he forsook the errors of Calvin and embraced those of Henry VIII. The Episcopalian Bishop Brown, of Fond du Lac, took the turnoaround Vilatte and ordained him a Munchausen stories about Vilatte, so as to rake in the dollars by duping the gullible churches. Brown succeeded, but he did not succeeded in perverting a dozen Belgian Catholics in the Diocese of Green Bay. The Bishop of Green Bay, in his last out of the fog, and the Belgian Catholics of Wisconsin have chased her out of every parish. Brown and Harford the Lac fanatical friend say that some 30,000 Belgians, French, Canadians, Bohemians and Wallons have been converted by their efforts, but such "conversions" have no truth whatever to make them worthy of credence. As Vilatte, Burns, of the Fathers of Mercy, who have charge of the Belgian Catholics of Green Bay, says

"Let Catholics, both in the West and the East, look out for the Old Catholic Free Vilatte. He has fooled the people, insulted the Bishops and priests, and still has not enough to collect money from Roman Catholics! As to the rest he is laughable. It is well calculated to draw money from the pockets of the ignorant and the prejudiced of Protestant Eastern cities.

Such is a true picture of "Pere" Vilatte, and its publication will help to lift the scales from the sectarian eyes of the Parish Chimes, which seem all such pictures as through a glass darkly.

— The number of pilgrims already received by the Holy Father, whether in private or collective audiences, is computed at 64,000, namely 30,000 Italians, 10,000 French, 4,000 Germans, 2,000 English, 1,000 Hungarians, 2,000 Spaniards, and 1,000 Belgians, the remainder being of various nationalities. The Cardinals admitted to private audience numbered fifty-two; the Patriarchs, Archbishops and Bishops of different rites 480; the other ecclesiastical dignitaries over 700. The Pope has admitted to private audiences numerous representatives of the Catholic press of all lands, notably of Italy, France, Spain, Austria, Holland, etc. The gifts in money and in articles of gold and of silver, are calculated to amount to over forty millions, without computing the artistic gifts which figure in the Vatican Exhibition.

— Pope Leo XIII., exhorts all Christians to adopt or faithfully keep up the pious custom of daily reciting the beads. Pius IX. called the Rosary the most efficacious prayer in increasing devotion to Mary in the hearts of the faithful. The Blessed Virgin herself said to Blessed Alanus: "Next to hearing the Holy Mass, the Rosary is the exercise that pleases me the most.

— A recent cablegram from Rome states that a correspondence negotiations between the Church and the Czar have completely collapsed. Russia demanded impossible concessions, stipulating that the Catholic Bishops throughout Russia should be appointed by the Czar; that the Russian language should be exclusively used in the Catholic churches in Russia, both in preaching and in catechism, and that the offspring of mixed marriages should be educated in the orthodox Russian church.

CONTROVERTED POINTS ON CATHOLIC MATTERS.

I. Dr. Littledale and his Trustworthiness.

In the columns of one of our daily papers, the Morning Call, there appeared recently, viz. Sunday, 19th, and Monday, 20th of last month, some queries and answers, which, bearing, as they do, on Catholic matters, we propose to answer, for the benefit of our Catholic readers, and for the benefit of our separated brethren, who may, instead of gaining strife, secure, by a little reading, a good deal of information, which, if they be honest, they will not fail to have recourse to, whenever any misunderstanding or controversy may happen to be called upon to answer questions concerning Catholic subjects and doctrines. Perhaps, if some of our readers should happen to be amongst the numerous readers of our Ritualistic brethren, seeing the place of our Ritualistic brethren, seeing the place of our Ritualistic brethren, seeing the place

Farm and Home.

Little Things That Kill.

At various times the newspapers have warned the public against swallowing the seeds of grapes, oranges, etc., because of the danger of such substances getting into a small intestinal bag, or sac, or cecal by doctors the appendix vermiformis. This is a receptacle formed at the junction of the large and small intestines, but its use or object as physiologists know it has been thought to be a rudimentary or incomplete formation—or possibly some meaningless survival of a lost anterior type. At any rate, its existence, while presenting no apparent "reason for being," as the French say, is on the other hand, a positive and constant source of danger, because of the liability of its becoming the receptacle of some undigested seed or some indigestible substance. In that case it produces a state of inflammation, which, in nearly all cases, proves fatal. Fortunately, but few seeds among the great number so heedlessly swallowed seem to get into this little death trap—although any one seems likely to lodge there. Perhaps more cases of inflammation of the bowels than the doctors suspect may be, in reality, due to this disregarded cause. One and case which to day produces a feeling of deep regret among thousands, and which plunges a family into overwhelming grief, occurred in this city recently, in the lamented death of J. R. Dwyer, the much esteemed adjutant of the governor's foot-guards—a man whose place that corps cannot make good. His case so baffled the physicians that an autopsy was had, and that revealed a piece of peanut shell in the appendix vermiformis.

Cuts.

If the edges of a cut are drawn closely together before it has entirely stopped bleeding and kept in their places, it will heal very rapidly and leave no perceptible scar. Gut surgeon's adhesive plaster, both kinds, the thin and the strong, cut it into narrow strips, and when the bleeding has nearly ceased, wash the wound with a soft sponge or piece of old linen wet with warm water, and dry it carefully; then dip the thin plaster into water and apply it. Being transparent, you can see through it that the edges are united; then warm the thick plaster, and bind it over the other, and bandage, if the wound requires it. This may have to be repeated after twenty four hours, but not if the plaster adheres well. This mode of surgery every woman should know, and be ready to practise if necessary, and the benefit to the sufferer will amply repay the effort at self-control it may require.

Cold Feet at Night.

The association between cold feet and sleeplessness is much closer than is commonly imagined. Persons with cold feet rarely sleep well, especially women. Yet the number of persons so troubled is very considerable. Cold feet should be dipped in cold water for a brief while—often just to immerse them and no more, is sufficient, and then they should be rubbed with a pair of hair flesh-gloves, or a rough Turkish towel immediately before getting into bed. After this a hot-water bottle will be unnecessary enough in maintaining the temperature of the feet, though without this preliminary it is impotent to do so. Disagreeable as the plan at first sight may appear, it is sufficient, and those who have once fairly tried it continue it, finding that they have got an end to their bad nights and cold feet. Pills, lotions, lozenges, "night caps," all narcotics, fail to woo sleep successfully.

Aid to Digestion.

It is not so generally understood as it should be that good oysters, when in season, have medicinal qualities of a high order. They are not only nutritious, but wholesome, especially in cases of indigestion. It is said, "Then is no alimentary substance, not even excepting bread, that does not produce indigestion under certain circumstances but oysters." Oyster juice promotes digestion. By taking them daily, indigestion has been cured. Invalids, who have found other kinds of food disagree with them, often discover in oysters the required element. Raw oysters are highly recommended for consumers. Many of the leading voralists use them regularly before concerts or operas, but their strongest recommendation is the remarkably wholesome influence exerted upon the digestive organs.

Furniture Polish.

A fine, lustrous polish for delicate cabinet work can be made as follows: Half pint of linseed oil, half pint old ale, the whits of an egg, one ounce spirits of wine, one ounce spirits of nalta. Shake well before using. A little to be applied to the face of a soft linen pad and lightly rubbed for a minute or two over the article to be restored, which should be first rubbed off with an old silk handkerchief. It will keep any length of time if well corked.

To Remove Warts.

A correspondent of a medical contemporary states that he has found the application of a strong solution of chromic acid three or four times, by means of a camel's hair pencil, to be the most efficient and easy method of removing warts. They become black and soon fell off.

Sound Health.

The following signs may be accepted as evidence of sound health: 1. Individual adaptability; the capacity in man to adapt himself to extremely opposite conditions of existence without suffering in energy. 2. Endurance; the capacity of supporting considerable bodily or mental labour without suffering from fatigue, or of repairing the latter quickly. 3. Self command; the capacity of controlling the emotions, blunting as well as sharpening the sensations of will.

Tender Turkey.

If you have any doubt in regard to the age of a turkey or any other large fowl, it is a wise precaution to steam it until you can lift the wing from the body with ease. Do not stuff it before steaming, but two or three stalks of celery may be placed in it, and they will give a delicious flavor to the meat.

Chocolate Custards.

One-fourth of a cake of chocolate, one pint of boiling water, six eggs, one quart of milk, one half cup of white sugar, two teaspoons of vanilla. Dissolve the chocolate in a very little milk, stir into the boiling water and boil three minutes. When nearly cold add the beaten eggs, stir in to the milk, flavor and pour in cups; set in boiling water and bake.

—Landlady (to boarder)—"How is the butter, Mr. Dimby?"

—Dimby (a produce broker)—Quiet; but strong, madam, and in little demand."

—"See, mamma," cried little Johnny, "there goes the snake woman we saw at the circus."

—"Oh, Johnny, it isn't a snake woman; it is a lady with a fur boa around her neck."

—Mrs. Lastyo (to her dearest friend)—Yes, Aurelia, my husband proposed to me three times before I accepted him.

—The D. F.—You always was a reckless girl, Josephine.

—Farmer's Daughter—"I suppose you want my father to take you in for the season?"

—Tramp—"No, Miss, if you will kindly sew a shirt on to this button, that's all I ask."

—Little Jay Schemburg having fallen and raised a lump on his forehead, somebody suggested to his mother to press a silver dollar on the bruised place, which would cause the swelling to subside. "Hopeless," said Miss Schemburg, "you don't need a whole toller. Schoot prese a half a toller on dot bump on. Vat for you vant to indulge in so many extravagances?"

—Mr. D. Sappy—Yas, sah, time works wonders. Why, when I was born, I was the youngest in my family, and now I have few brothers all younger than myself.

Admiring Crowd—Isn't it extraordinary.

—He, with emotion—Now, dearest, that you have accepted my proposal, let us seal it with a kiss.

She, in a business tone,—What's the number, your bid has been accepted, and there's no need of sealed proposals.

—He, at late hour, with deep tendarness in his voice—Darling, I love you.

She,—Really, Mr. Singer, I can't tell you. I wish I would.

—Scotchy Bille—Mother, Mr. De Brass has proposed and I have accepted.

Mether—What! Oh, you wicked, ungrateful girl, after all we've done for you. Mr. De Brass hasn't a cent to bless him wi' wih, and won't have until his father and grandfather die.

"The Mr. De Brass I am referring to is my grandfather."

"Oh. Bless you my children."

—Minister (about starting for church)—I have been requested by several members of the congregation to pray for rain this morning.

Wife (of great faith)—We do need rain badly. Hadn't we better take the umbrella, John.

Minister—No, I think we will be able to reach home before the storm comes.

Suspicious.

Waiter Girl—"You better get your board in advance from that man who says he's a United States detective.

Landlady—"He looks honest."

"He's no detective; he'd never suspect anybody of anything. He ate his mince pie without once looking under the crust."

An Arizona Seance.

Felso Man—"Want to a spiritual seance down in Arizona, eh! anything happen?"

Arizona Man—"Well, yes. The medium went into a trance, and then announced that he was a spirit of a man who had been murdered and that the murderer sat in the audience.

"Well, well. Did anybody run?"

"We all ran."

A Cornered Count

Practical American Father—"Now, before we go any farther in this matter, Count, for as my daughter is concerned, I should like you to establish your identity."

Count—"Mon Dieu! I till show you my patent of nobility."

F. A. F.—That is all very well. I own several patents myself, but how do I know yours is not an infringement?"

How to Frighten Drummers.

Friend—Don't you have a great many drummers coming in and boring you with their samples and talk?

Merchant—A good many drummers come in here, but they don't bore me.

"Don't they ask you to look at their samples?"

"No."

"Now ask you for orders?"

"They go right out without saying a word."

"How do you manage to get rid of them."

"It's the simplest thing in the world. I put a plug hat and an open gripsack on the counter every morning. When a drummer sees these signs of another drummer being on the premises he goes off. Etsy ten minutes in the day a drummer comes to the door, looks at the gripsack, and goes away, and I am left in peace.

ECHOES FROM ROME

Vatican Exhibition Views.

HANDSOME GIFTS FROM HOLLAND.

Grand Presents from France and Belgium.

The Rome correspondent of the Dublin Nation thus describes some of the more prominent Jubilee gifts sent to the Holy Father by the Catholics of Holland and Belgium, as he saw them in the Vatican Exhibition.

I begin by Holland. As everywhere else, we have here a profusion of gold and enamel work, and especially a remarkable collection of Byzantine chalices, also a mediæval casket of most precious workmanship, a gift from the old town of Utrecht. Hereunto is chiefly remarkable for the beautiful piece of silk needlework, a marvel of delicacy and patience—the work of the Ursuline nuns—and representing a picture of Bethlehem. There is also an extraordinary missal, a master-piece of illuminating and printing on vellum. It is curious to note in this Exhibition the superior artistic tendency of Northern countries in religious matters. In the South religious art tends more to the Pagan and Greek styles, whilst in the North Gothic art predominates.

But let us enter Belgium. Here there is more industrial than artistic element, and at first sight looks some like a huge bazaar than an artistic exhibition. Everything is crowded by hundreds and thousands here—as 10,000 rosaries, 2,000 cups, 800 mission chests, travelling bags without number, portable cupboards, lithographic machines, colored prints, countless of church linen, etc. Of all these things the mission chests seem to have found the most favor at the Vatican. They are filled with everything necessary to any Mass. Nothing is omitted, not even the little portable altar and the priest's robe. The rosaries and medals included in the chest are intended for presents to the women and children of the savage tribes. All these articles, although rich in appearance, are not rich in reality, because if the had been really rich they might have tempted the dishonest, who are to be found in savage as well as in civilized countries.

BEAUTIFUL GIFTS FROM BELGIUM.

But from Belgium there have come, too, many articles of great intrinsic value. The Limbourg schools, for instance, have sent some very costly and splendid things, and the town of Tournai sent a whole library of Gothic manuscripts, which are very tempting to some visitors. The Exhibition is not, however, exclusively occupied with articles strictly religious. By the side of the sacred objects we see a Spanish Court cloak, embroidered with gold, which looks as though it had been laid aside by some noble matron who had been set to watch the treasures of the Exhibition. And, as if in sublimest contrast to the sacred, we see there the guns and other arms of destruction sent by the town of Liege.

Beautiful, however, is a Van Orley "Madonna and Holy Infant," a masterpiece of the Flemish school. This is the best thing of all the Belgian Exhibition, unless we except the lace, which is truly splendid—so splendid that, even the Vatican, accustomed as it is to see lovely lace, remained astounded. As for the ladies, they stand as if magnetized before this lace. Altogether, indeed, the Exhibition pleases the ladies more than the men who visit—perhaps on account of the abundance of lace, gold, tapestries and needle work which fill the room. Nuns of all classes—rich and poor—have grown old working at these wonderful tapestries, altar-covers, church linen, &c., to say nothing of all the embroidered white silk and purple velvet slippers.

SUPERB PRESENTS FROM FRANCE.

Pilgrims—to whatever country they belong—are always bent on finding the Exhibition of their own particular town or village—there one gifts, in a word. When they find this they are in rapture, and they rub their hands with glee, calling to everyone around to share their enthusiasm. The French, especially, are loud in French praise. In their eyes there is nothing in the whole Exhibition to equal the lace sent by the Catholic ladies of Paris. In fact, it is one of the most valuable gifts sent to the Pope. It is not only of rare and delicate workmanship, but it is also rich in gems and precious stones. The foundation of the robe is of Oriental silver cloth, embroidered with the finest pearls.

The three crowns are of massive dissilled gold, studded with many precious stones around each crown. The ball is of gold with a brilliant of thirty grammes in the centre, and the cross above the ball is all of diamonds varying from eight to ten grammes. The ribbons are of royal richness. The cape which contains it is of white crocodile skin, with the arms of the lady donors in gold enamel upon it, and it is lined with crimson gold, with the Pope's arms written upon it with precious stones of the same size and value as those on the tiara itself. Then and once together cost over $40,000. The Pope wore it for the Jubilee Mass. He took it off before giving the Papal Blessing, however.

Magnificent specimens of needlework are also seen in the French Department, as the vestments made which the Pope wore when he said the Jubilee Mass, and that wonderous representation of our Saviour, embroidered in relief, all in gold and silk, with a golden halo and a golden globe in His hand, which is a perfect gem. Besides these really beautiful gems of artistic workmanship, we see vegetables, imitation fruit, sugar candy, soupot, and other common-place articles, which satisfy the Exhibition to the desired, as universal, where everything can be had from a work of art to a pound of brown sugar.

"It is," says Cardinal Bernardou, "a most relic of nations that the lots of Leo's children brings these voluntary tributes that constitute the Vatican Exhibition. Some our damned eyes did not know which to admire more the number of the gifts or the richness of the articles. Sovereigns and subjects, governments and peoples, rich and poor, all have given the gold from their opulence, or the farthings from their poverty, with that which gives the preference the highest value. And this page which Catholic faith is writing in honor of the Pope will to all time be one of the most beautiful that the annals of the Church have ever reprised."

Released from Jail.

DUBLIN, March 6.—Wilfred Blunt has been released from Tullamore Jail to-day.

Violation of the Crimes Act.

DUBLIN, March 6.—Snelling, the English Home Rule delegate, has been arrested in Limerick, for offenses under the Crimes Act.

DUBLIN, March 6.—Gilhooly, member of Parliament, was today convicted at Schull, county Cork, for offenses under the Crimes Act, and sentenced to two months' imprisonment without hard labor.

—On last Sunday the Holy Father consecrated the first bishop of the Pontifacate.

CABLEGRAMS FROM IRELAND.

BRITISH PARLIAMENT.

LONDON, February 28.—In the Commons this evening, after a sharp debate on the rules and procedure rule, which reduced to 100, the majority necessary to closure, the closure was adopted. Smith then moved the adoption of the rule enabling the speaker to order the withdrawal of disorderly members or to ask the House to decide upon the conduct of such members. It was then proposed, Bolton and T. P. O'Connor vigorously opposing it. Hicks Beach argued that it was necessary to render possible punishment of disorderly members. The amendment was rejected.

The rule increasing the Speaker's power was adopted by a vote of 154 to 74. The House rule empowering the Speaker or Chairman to stop a member who, after being warned, persists in making irrelevant remarks, or indecently repeating his own arguments, or arguments of others, was adopted.

Hay, Liberal Unionist, was to-day defeated without opposition to the House of Commons for Hampstead, to fill the vacancy caused by the elevation of Sir Henry Holland, Colonial Secretary, to the peerage.

The Crofters Threaten Trouble.

LONDON, February 28.—A correspondent says that the North of Scotland is developing into another Ireland, and greater troubles is expected there before long among the crofters.

Can Refused from Prison.

LONDON, February 28.—Cox, member of Parliament, sentenced to one month's imprisonment for inciting tenants to conspiracy, was released to-day. Cox made a speech to a crowd, denouncing Chief Secretary Balfour, and announcing that the National League was stronger than ever. He was enthusiastically greeted with numerous addresses.

A NEWSPAPER HOAX.

A Ridiculous Report about Fenian Pirates.

LONDON, March 1.—The Chronicle to-day gives editorial prominence to the following ridiculous story. It appears that the Prince of Wales had a narrow escape the other day from being kidnapped by Fenian pirates. While at San Remo he went out for a little sail in an Italian pinnace. For several days previous a mysterious yacht had been seen hovering about the port. It bore the American colors, and the people thought it was engaged in taking scientific soundings. The Prince's pinnacle had barely got out to sea when the strange yacht, pulling on ahead, bore down on it in a suspicious manner. Fortunately a gunboat belonging to the Italian squadron happened to be the handy, and perceiving signals of distress hoisted by the pinnacle, at once made for the place, which now hoisted the Irish flag. The chase lasted some time, but the yacht succeeded in getting off. Meanwhile the Prince of Wales got back to port, happy in having escaped from captivity, which would have lasted as long as the English Government refused justice to Ireland.

Gladstone Returns Thanks for an Important Memorial.

LONDON, March 1.—Gladstone to-day, in returning thanks for 250 clergymen of the Church of England for a memorial drawn up by them in favor of Home Rule, said he believed it would have the effect of widening the growing conviction that neither honor nor advantage can possibly be gained by a continued refusal to confer this moderate and constitutionally expressed demands of the Irish people.

Remains of an Irish Patriot.

QUEENSTOWN, March 1.—The body of Stephen J. Meaney arrived here to-day on the steamer Wyoming from New York, and was taken to Ennis. The proceedings of the party accompanying the body were watched by detectives.

A Patriotic Demonstration.

CORK, March 1.—The body of Stephen J. Meany was escorted through the principal streets by a huge funeral procession, in which the Mayor of the city and all the prominent patriots and National Leagers took part.

More Money for Ireland.

DETROIT, March 3.—The following cablegram was sent this morning:

VOICE OF THE ANNIVERSARY: OF ROBERT, THE MARTYR.

Dr. Joseph Kinsey, M. P., House of Commons, London, England—In memoriam of the man who died hard for Ireland, I transmit you $5,000 for men who are getting hurt in Ireland.

IRELAND'S PROSPECTS.

What the "Monitor" at Rome" Says Concerning them.

In a leading article entitled "The Parliamentary situation in England," the Monitor de Rome makes some comments on the coercion policy of the Salisbury Ministry, concerning which it would be well for the Irish people and their supporters to take to heart. "Yes thing certain," says the Monitor, "is that the coercion law has in no way disarmed the Irish National party. On the contrary, the Nationalists are more at ease than ever in the assertion of their claims." The opinion of this journal is that the correct and fearless attitude of the Irish opinion is not in these rigorous measures, and that "coercion is but a hazardous expedient which cannot but result in failure." This, of course, means the downfall of the actual Ministry—a possibility which the Monitor does not look upon as highly improbable. In conclusion, the article, which throughout manifests full sympathy with the Home Rule cause, urges the Irish people to follow the advice given by his Holiness to the recent pilgrimage, and keep their agitation within the law. "Ireland will be the first to gain by this attitude—she will win the sympathy of English opinion, and the Halfour policy will correspondingly become more and more odious and impracticable."

Rhenish Pilgrims.

ROME, February 27.—The Papa yesterday received 600 Rhenish Pilgrims, including the Archbishop of Mayence and three members of the Reichstag.

WORKING PEOPLE

Are often in that wretched state of health, really sick but not to alarm, but so weakened that they cannot do a day's work. Now if they would use Hop Bitters they would not be sick, nor feel as they do, and save doctors' bills and sickness. Lose of time means loss of money. Multitudes of hard-working people, rich and poor, are now in good health, and happy, thanks to Hop Bitters. But many needlessly make hard work perform duties, when a few bottles of Hop Bitters would give them vigor and make hard labor light.

The Hop is the prime source of nearly all healthy elements, viz.:

Dyspepsia, Constipation, Headache, Sour Stomach, Biliousness, Colic, Low Spirits, Kidney Affections

And a medicine the Hop Bitters Manufacturing Co. of Rochester, N. Y., and San Francisco, Cal., and Toronto, Ont., and Hop Bitters, which the proprietors have made, is the best medicine ever made. Mr. B. G. Wilkes, Proprietor, N. Y., says: "Hop Bitters saved my life. I was a wreck, and could not walk a block from weakness."

To the Victims of Vaccination.

It is a well-known fact that people, and particularly children, lose their good health, vitality, appetite, etc., after being vaccinated. Shortly after vaccination many persons suffer eruption on the skin, diseases of a contagious and scrofulous nature, and discharge from the latter lasting months, etc.

All those who consequence are entitled to recover, and the local portion of it may be cured by Electro-Homo-Pathic remedies. We have cured hundreds of cases of this kind, and the Medical Commentary hospitals do so, too, to know about the Electro-Homo-Pathic treatment, and to visit those hospitals and get free medicines of simple pure, healthfulness, sensation, remedies, etc., of the best effect.

All who suffer from the consequence of vaccination ought to consult the official representative for Electro-Homo-Pathy, Dr. J. Hermann, 215 Pleasant, and they will positively be cured of the trouble after this, and at a very small expense.

THE DRUID'S DREAM.

In snow-gone, leaf-rung in Erin's isle,
The pagan priests offering wild
Deep echoing the valse among;
While out of day bright beauty lies glittering smile,
Full of happiness serene,
Flooding all her head of green
With his rainbow colored sheen.
From mantled green and military tree,
Clear sings the bird with wondrous melody,
Fits angel warbling stream,
Kissed by the sun's bright beams,
With increased joy doth seem Half to extend along
To the soul-inspiring song
Thrilled forth by myriad throats the grove among.
Blindly the flowers shine,
Jewelled with dew divine;
Sparkling like the stars of night,
Flashing forth their rays of light;
While on the towers old,
Mantled and clothed with gold,
To the gods all-potent name;
Now deep and full,
A song most beautiful
Quires through the listening air;
'Tis the priest's adorter prayer.
The nation all seen catch the strain,
Redoubling it with glad refrain;
Till soon from shore to shore,
The melody they pour,
Rivals the thunder of the ocean's roar.
Oh! 'tis a sorrowing sight
To see 'neath Heaven's light,
The aspect drear of Satan in the stone,
Not thinks the fault that table given
Embroids their mind;
In fallen nature sunk to find,
Why rest they in a pagan tomb.
Long held the priests their sway supreme,
Until a troubled dream
Disturbed his wan lance of their reign.
Thy dream a man who vision rare delight,
And hyget abroad the seeds of living light
Thus his fadeless fire of Tara's mount,
From sky-light that shines ever;
Would rise perpetual light and solitude,
That large forever spread
The deep full prayers and supplicate
In universal symphonies
To Jesus, Saviour of the world,
Whose radiant banner full unfurled,
Shall float from North to South from East to West;
And every loyal Irish breast
Shall guard it with unflagging zest—
Through smile and tears,
Through ill, by the k,
Mid persecution a Spanish Conscript:
They if Ith gold, which ever leave,
Their dear land but said-around even
To die beneath the ban of a Spanish security strong.
F the Exhibition and vale,
Amid of the ships of every gale
Wonder rise the choral strains of true adoration Sung
This was the dream
That made them dream;
The empire of their power had passed away,
The pagan gods had seen their final day.

LINES

ON HEARING OF THE DEATH OF THE REV. ARCHDEACON RAYMOND, P. P., ST. MARK'S, CO. MAYO.

Sweet is the hour, that saintly pastor, rather,
The interest, "Father" of that hallowed place
By Heaven; to the Almighty Master,
The unfeigned servant; whose angelic face
Proclaimed him far less of earth than Heaven.
Of majestic height; and with what grace
He met his mark, from more till even,
To bless and raise the lowliest of his race.

How sweetly spoke he—with lips emotion,
The sweet same Mary, and the Pilgrims there
Met his calm smile with almost a devotion;
Love, so sublimely pure, few mortals share.
The mourned departed not, when his sacred hand
They touched; heavenly seemed the very air
Around him, where thousands crowded, and
He met each in turn, with a smile and prayer.

With fond remembrance, when lowly hearing,
My dear archdeacon, you will share my prayer;
And with me millions are each day appealing
To the highest Heaven—may you be there
So I fondly trust; and that sacred shrine,
(Where from worse than death I was set free;)
To see some day, God grant the lot be mine;
Yet without kiss, Knock, I'd scarce know thee.

[FOR THE MONITOR.]

A SOLDIER'S WORLD.

(After the battle of Waterloo a hospital showed up amongst the images of wounded and dying, discovering a young man with his left arm torn off by a cannon ball. Hoeering to the dying man's side the surgeon, kind, and, seeing his hand, forced a little water down his throat. The dying revived a little energy and strength in the author who opened his eyes on the steward, and said, "Tell my mother I die for my country.")

Some year in time, faithful to my country, dying in my mother and bound to myself. "A moment later he fell back—a corpse."

"I am true," said the soldier as he gasped death-fly wounded,
"To my mother, myself, to my country and God!"
And a smile of serenity rounded
His face as he sank on the sod.
No stone marks the place
Where that warrior lies,
For his deeds were of God,
And his truth of the skies:
But in Heaven an angel of reward will arise
To honor the hero unknown here below.
For, mark me!
The man who is kind to his mother,
And faithful to conscience and virtue and right,
And true to his country, and ever obedient
To God—is a hero of destiny nameless;
Though a peasant or earth,
Yet in Heaven's bright eyes
He rise as a throne,
And his title is King,
And his privileges a crown!

We would most respectfully ask the Rev. Clergy, or any of our readers of the entire Pacific Coast, to send us local items of general interest. We wish to make the MONITOR a storehouse of all Diocesan happenings relating to the progress of religion, but we cannot do so unless we are aided by our friends in the different parts of the Pacific Coast keeping. Bare facts are all we want. Will our friends please furnish us with them?

The Conversion of the Carolans.

An Irish-American Story of Love, Sacrifice and Repentance

WRITTEN FOR THE MONITOR, BY MISS M. MULCAHY.

Almost twenty years ago, in a rather luxurious garden in the North of Ireland, a lady mysteriously walked upon the soft grass at eve pale. Looking away to the west, her eye reached to where the setting sun poured forth its last beams over dead and laved attendant of green fields. But her brow was wrinkled with anxious thought, and her black eyes were not filled with the peaceful radiance that fell upon her, but tinged with the anxiety of a mother's care. Too weary was she to notice the loveliness of the hour, until a thought checked her progress, then suddenly she gave a longing gaze to the meadows that slanted under a weight of sunset arrows. "Oh, it is beautiful it is beautiful, our own home," she murmured, then her waiting heart was gladdened, and her eyes shone with pride as she looked on the hoyah form that had lapped the hallow then lodge, and stood at her side.

For some time they were silent while the shadows and sunshine of a lovelong twilight mingled in blessing over them. Then Mrs. Carolan whispered.

"John, my darling, do you love your home?"

"Yes, mother," answered the boy. "Fair to my eye, and very dear to my heart is Erin, but a blight has fallen upon her which we cannot remedy, and it is better that we—"

"There is no one like this John, that floods our valleys," the mother said, with gentle remonstrance, "we have nothing to do with the wretchedness of Poperty, because to and it, will bring discomfort and sorrow to our home."

John made no reply. He could not agree with his mother. His own unbending principles of right and wrong would suffer not the slightest change.

"Mother, we cannot help our poor country, but we need not stay here and witness her sufferings. There is Liberty in the world somewhere, even though English tyranny and religious prejudice has fastened Ireland for a victim." "Yes mother," he weeds, vigorously, "I must say it, for truth requires it. Pagan, and patriotism does not fear the searching light of day nor the scrutiny of honest men. Pagan is freedom and justice to be found on the earth, and oh! darling, mother, that we could go with Kathleen and Isabel to Ann-ica and be at—"

Mrs. Carolan was too agitated by the vague proposal to at once reply, but she smiled through her tears at the boy who was so ready to protect his mother and sisters.

Two young men bounded over the lawn as John had done, but they did not observe their mother and John in the deepening gloom.

"It's nearly time old boy to catch that meeting, and Maurice, as the Lodge rang from the Catholic Church every hour."

"It wouldn't do to miss that fun," laughed the other, and then their voices sank to a whisper.

"John," said Mrs. Carolan, with wistful earnestness, "father is in the house with his friends. That is why I waited for you here; you will be careful dear and not interfere with them. You know you are hasty."

"I will go up-stairs," replied John, quickly, "don't worry, mother, and with an impulsive caress, he too started away. His mother had seen with sinking heart his dark face and the angry light that flashed forth at his brother's words.

"Blessed mother, some deep misery will come from their bigotry which their father has instilled into them, and I have looked passively on account with doubtful eyes; but oh, God, it was for my children's sake, so send us my love vengeance, but spare them."

In an abandonment of frightened grief, Catherine Carolan suffered with pain almost physical, and prayed that John might find no cause to do what he had threatened—to leave his home and the wretchedness of idolatrous, for the untrammeled liberty of thought and action, that stepped in romantic beauty the fair-fed land of America.

A light step came through the darkness cracking the dry leaves, and a fresh young voice called.

"Mother, are you here?"

In a moment a young girl of fifteen stood under the old trees side, and laid whispered, "we want you mamma, for tea."

"Who is inside, dear," said Mrs. Carolan, drawing nearer to the slender form of the girl, whose tender, silent sympathy was so grateful.

"Only Kathleen, and the boys, mother," Isabel answered, with persuasive quickness, "father has gone out with Mr. Delaney and the Richards, and he said not to wait. This is Lodge night, Thursday."

"I am sorry to disturb Mrs. Carolan, was the beauty and wealth of her new country. John cries not to greet her at Castle Garden, and yet while the emigrants anxiously waited in New York Mr. Carolan carried in silence for some moments his son. He could not be severe and unforgiving in the face of this uncertainty, but they could not mind him, and disheartened with the home that promised so much, they finally turned to that far West, the elder sons remaining in the East.

"Do you know, mamma, that Lord is coming, and Easter will come here, the seventh in America, lightly begun Kathleen Carolan, as with her mother and Isabel, she slightly dusted the shaded angels of their new home in the West.

It was another summer hour, for the trees, quiet light and shade, the great rose-bushes in avenues, and clumps, and parks, the ring-mind the spot, beautiful Western city.

"Mamma I was beginning to feel like a heathen, mamma," plaintively murmured Isabel, who shivered as she passed a some what dismal looking Methodist church.

"Now, Liberty Grove Lee," went on Kathleen, "she offered several times to take us to their Methodist meetings, but it doesn't seem right, they are so cold.

"As well say at home, child, answered Mrs Carolan, "and papa would never think of it." They had broken in on a train of thought, and she dismissed the matter with an unconscious haughtiness that was not lost on a gentleman who had passed them with a contemptuous bow.

"That is Mr. Sorris, I think," said Isabel, quickly, "I know what is in his face, I wish, you have met him."

"Indeed does not pass at consciousness, Kathleen, has you, I think," and her mother.

"But mamma, mother, explained Kathleen, tells us both that he is charming, but I would like to know something more definite of him."

"He is very nice," said Isabel, her lress tinged with a street radiance.

"Oh" Isabel, is that delicate? exclaimed Kathleen.

"Well, then," and Isabel's pained brought down a cluster of bloom, "He is a Roman Catholic?"

"Always Roman Catholics," murmured Kathleen, as she left the room to Kathleen to her.

"Oh mother the Catholics are have a beautiful church and always have good services, you know they are nearer to us than any other sect", and Isabel.

"Hush, Isabel, hush, I know all that, and I'm sorry for your sake, and I wish to go, she said, Kathleen, she sighed for simplicity and mind.

"Come this side, on our way home, and Isabel, said Kathleen, I will show you a lovely bed of lilies and roses, that Aunt Louis Fa the altar."

"Oh, be careful, children, and Mrs. Carolan, "I know papa will be very angry if you make any friends among these Catholics.

"But it is perfectly unreasonable in him, mother," Kathleen, "there is no Protestant Episcopal Church here, and that lovely little Romanic one to better than the Methodist. We catch friends of those Bible, mother dear, and promise to come with us Sunday night. I know I have done wrong, John, she added laughingly. And reluctantly the promise was given.

Ah! how they would have trembled with feverish excitement, had they known the revelations and surprises which that visit to the Catholic Church brought about. "Truly we are the helpless puppets of Destiny, and Destiny is only another name for Divine Providence.

A Remarkable Woman.

NEW YORK, February 26.—Probably one of the most remarkable women now in New York is Fern Schlamm, the mother of Leon Schlamm, who is a clerk in Judge Hewitt's Trial Court. Mrs. Schlamm is older than the century. She to day celebrated her 102d birthday, and it was made the occasion of a great gathering of her descendants, friends and well wishers to offer their congratulations. She was born on February 25, 1786, in Prussia, and came to this country in 1847. Mrs. Schlamm had thirteen children, of whom only two are now alive. She has had fifty four grandchildren, four only survive, of them are now alive. She had thirty two great grandchildren, of whom twenty are living. Of her great great-children, twenty-six are living. Of her great great great-children, twelve are living. Mrs. Schlamm has her faculties almost as clear as ever. Her memory on certain points is unpleasant, it is a living power that will stir and kindle the spirit of her descendants, and the trumpet sounds and the last of the fleet are heard in Russia. The Battle of Waterloo, though to her recollection, and indeed the only event of her long life, which she can tell with the accuracy of a chronicle, and at last fled allowed that beautiful life to be sacrificed, and of the dead of thirteen of her children, four only survive, and of the dead of thirty two grandchildren, twelve only survive. She has thirty two great great grandchildren alive, and five great great great-children. Mrs. Schlamm is in almost unimpaired possession of all her faculties. She has a remarkably retentive store of reminiscences, and is especially fond of talking of her early days in Prussia. In 1806, just before she left Prussia, she was a school mistress. Her recollection of that morning is quite vivid. She was a school mistress, and was busy with the pupils, when a messenger came with the news that the French were in the town. The pupils were dismissed, and she was left alone with the school. She was a young woman of twenty years, and was in a state of excitement, and was so much so that she was unable to leave the school. She was in a state of excitement, and was so much so that she was unable to leave the school. She was in a state of excitement, and was so much so that she was unable to leave the school. She

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Cardinal Wallimer Czacki died in Rome last week. He was a native of Poland, having been born at Pozyck on April 10th, 1834. He was created Cardinal-Priest on September 26th, 1882. R. I. P.

— Our readers will find on the second page this week the first part of a very interesting original Catholic story written for this Monitor by Miss Mary Malesky, a gifted young lady whom we predict will yet take rank among the literary lights of the Catholic world.

— Cardinal Howard attained his sixtieth year last month. His Eminence was born in Nottingham England, and is a distant relative of the Duke of Norfolk, being the grandson of the brother of the 15th Duke. He was formerly an officer of the 2nd Life Guards.

Mgr. Dunnet, author of the "History of Cardinal Pa," has been appointed Rector of the Catholic University of Lille. The former Rector, Mgr. Hautcoeur, has been appointed Chancellor of the University in the place of Mgr. Monnier, who has been named as Honorary Chancellor.

— A cablegram from Rome reports the Holy Father as having been ill for a couple of days last week. No serious symptoms have manifested themselves, but a certain degree of apprehension exists in consideration of the Sovereign Pontiff's age and the laurels caused by the exertions he was compelled to during the Jubilee festivities.

— The Irish societies of Detroit, Michigan, have hit upon a happy method of uniting patriotism with charity. They have decided that the proceeds of their banquet on St. Patrick's Day shall go into the hands of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd in that city. Here is an example which might be advantageously followed in other localities.

— Public school troubles in Mississippi are serious affairs. Down there they teach the young idea how to shoot" in more ways than one. A row occurred over the expulsion of two pupils and the enemies and friends of the teacher chose sides and had an old-fashioned shooting match. Two persons were killed and several wounded.

— One of the most beautiful and costly gifts which Mr Hoffman has received in a cruise sent by the Prince of Monaco. It was made in Paris, and is constructed of gold, which is encrusted from top to bottom with diamonds, rubies, sapphires and emeralds. It is a masterpiece of the jeweller's art.

— April 10th next will be the fiftieth anniversary of the day on which in the little Church of Santa Croce in Gerusalemme, Father Mathew pronounced the decisive words: "Here goes in the name of God," and signed his name to the Total Abstinence Pledge. Jubilee commemorations are to be held in many of the Eastern States, and we hope the disciples of the Apostle of Temperance in this city and State will not fail to honor his memory.

— Balfour is carrying injustice to extremes in Ireland when an Irish news-dealer is sentenced to three months imprisonment for selling copies of a newspaper containing reports of suppressed branches of the League. Balfour will find himself mistaken if he thinks in this way to keep from the public all knowledge of the holding of proclaimed meetings. The meetings are held right along, and the fact is going to be published, jail or no jail.

— A London Chronicle telegram from Rome says: It may be remembered that some little time ago the Parliament of Quebec passed a Bill recognizing the existence of the Jesuits as a civil corporation. At that time the Bill was vigorously assailed by the opposition and the Premier, the Hon. H. Mercier, the Attorney-General and Prime Minister of the Province of Quebec, who was instrumental in the passing of the Bill, has now left Canada for Rome for the purpose of explaining his conduct to the Vatican.

— The death is announced of Mr. George V. Hooker, brother of the learned Very Rev Father Hooker, Superior of the Paulists. Mr. Hooker was an enterprising and successful New York merchant. He was a native of New York, of German parentage, and was one of the few Catholic laymen of America who take an active interest in Catholic literature. As we learn from the Catholic Review, it was his money which started the Catholic World, and the Young Catholic. He gave freely and with a most disinterested zeal whenever he was asked to help the Catholic Publication Society to do its noble work for Catholic literature. Few know those facts, for he was a man who never let his right hand know what his left had done. All he did for Catholic literature, and he did it in a way it is most needed—by furnishing money—will never be known until the day when all hidden things shall be revealed.

— The great Daniel O'Connell, the famous Irish orator, author and advocate, was made a Mason in 1799, in the city of Dublin—a fact not generally known.

A friend clipped this above paragraph from the Mobile Daily Call of recent date, and asks if it is true? It is, like many another similar circumstance when only half the truth is told, only partially true. O'Connell, when a young man, only 24 years old, was inducted into the Masonic Lodge, but—as he himself afterwards said—"it was at a very early period of my life, and either before an ecclesiastical censure had been published in the Catholic Church in Ireland prohibiting the taking of Masonic oaths, or at least before I was aware of that censure." O'Connell, like the good Catholic that he was, retired from the Masonic sect the day he discovered that the anathemas of the Church were hurled against that anti-Christian organization.

Farm and Home.

The Coughing Habit.

Coughing is often under control of the will and the result of habit. There are many people who consume a small portion of a lifetime in unnecessary coughing. At first a little irritation is felt, a cough is set up, and habit keeps it going until the irritation provoked produces a real and serious disease. Through force of sympathy coughing often becomes contagious. This can be illustrated in a schoolroom of restless boys and girls, one cough—like—the—chickpot the ball rolling, when the teacher addresses the school—another child takes up the musical note, then another, and still another until the teacher's voice is so persecution as if in the din of artillery. The teacher brings the ruler to the desk, and commands this noise to stop. There for an instant an eloquent silence prevails. In church we may sometimes observe the same thing—when some old lady, who has had a pet cough for years, sets up a coughing strain, which is soon followed, as if in chorus, by many other members. The poor preacher then wages an unequal contest and may as well stop preaching. These facts should be ample evidence that coughing is an act under control of the will in very many cases. In such cases a little application of "mind cure" can be made effective. The family physician can cure chronic cough not by a prescription but a simple command to stop them.

How to Keep Young.

milk as the standard food, but varied according to season. Take food, in moderate quantity, four times in the day, including a light meal before going to bed. Clothe yourself warmly but lightly, so that the body may in all seasons maintain its equal temperature. Keep the body in free exercise, and the mind serive and cheerful. Maintain an interest in what is going on in the world, and take part in reasonable hours and pleasures, although old age were not coming. Take plenty of sleep during sleeping hours. Spend seven hours in bed at the least, and take care during cold weather that the temperature of the bedroom is maintained at 60 deg. Fahr. Avoid passion, excitement, luxury.

Perfect Fruit Cake.

Many people are disappointed when they make fruit cake by finding the fruit sink to the bottom. There are causes for this. Fresh fruit is not good, if it is moist, it has not been floured; the cake has been stirred too much after the fruit is added. When fruit is intended to be put in cake, it must be warmed, floured, and added at the last thing, only stirring just enough to mix. If these matters are borne in mind there will be no failures.

Cranberry Jelly.

This jelly, on account of its beautiful color and clearness, is useful for ornament ing various sweet dishes. Wash and drain the berries, boil them soft, and while hot press them through a jelly bag or the mint strainer. Put the juice on to boil with one pound of sugar to every quart. If you boil it longer than a quarter of an hour it will lose its fine color. It should be cooked in an earthen preserve pan.

Delightful Doughnuts.

Three cupfuls of sugar, five eggs, one cupful of butter, one cupful of sour milk, one teaspoonful each of nutmeg and cinnamon, one teaspoonful of soda dissolved in hot water, flour for soft dough. Cream the butter and sugar; add in the eggs, whipped light; then the spices, the sour milk and soda, and enough flour. Roll out the dough into a sheet a quarter of an inch thick, cut into fancy shapes, and fry in boiling lard.

Magnificent Muffins.

One heaping cup flour, two-thirds cup meal, one and a half cups sour milk, one tablespoonful lard, one egg, salt and soda. Heat hard and put one spoonful of the batter into well buttered muffin cups, bake in a hot oven. They are so nice for breakfast and can be made so quickly. I have seen many recipes for muffins, but none just like this.—selected

White Mountain Cake.

Three cups sugar, one cup butter, one half cup sweet milk, whites of ten eggs, one half teaspoonful soda and one half teaspoonful cream tartar sifted with the flour, four and one-half cups flour, flavored with essence of bitter almond. Icing, whites of three eggs and one pound powdered sugar. Flavor with lemon juice. Bake in jelly-cake tins and fill with grated cocoanut sweetened with a quarter of its weight of powdered sugar, or with icing such as is made for Lou cake, only flavored with lemon entirely.

Weight of Burdett-Coutts' Inheritance.

The late Duchess of St. Albans left Miss Burdett Coutts the round sum of £1,600,000, or a sum of £1,000,000. The weight of this property, upon an average of gold, reckoning sixty ounces to the pound, is thirty-six tons, seven cwt., three quarters, twelve lbs., and would require 107 men to carry it, supposing that each of them carried the solid weight of 700 pounds. This sum may be partially guessed by considering that counting at the rate of sixty sovereigns a minute for eight hours a day and six days in the week, it would take ten weeks, two days and four hours to accomplish the task. In coverings by exact computation, each sovereign in diameter seven-twentieths of an inch, and placed in touch each other, it would reach 24 miles and 250 yards; and in even pieces, (12) miles 280, yards.

A Poor Man's Blessings.

"Who are those?" asks a fashionable lady of another.

"The Joneses," replied the friend.

"What a handsome couple! Have they a family?" gets answer one.

"Oh, no. They are really elegant people. They have no children," answers another lady.

A certain kind of fashionable people, and some heartless persons who are not fashionable, think it "bad taste" to have very few children, or even none; but the old-fashioned notion that children are a blessing still holds good. Children are a blessing, let Fashion sneer at them as she may; and the poor man who has many children has not only something to love, and to love him, but has done and is doing a service in giving her more workers—more men to make things grow, and more men to get the things that are grown, and to help on the grand development of the race.

—Archbishop Lamy has the honor of introducing the Sisters of Loretto to the far West. More than twenty years ago he brought a colony to his Diocese establishing them in Santa Fe and Denver, from which place they have now emerged the States and Territories of the West.

—The way to make money is to save it. Hoard a farm profits is the most economical medicine to buy, as it is the only medicine of which can truly be said, "100 doses one dollar." Do not take any other preparation if you have decided to buy Hood's Sarsaparilla.

Family Fun.

SEQUEL TO A CREMATION.

James Potter, of 77 Spoonore street, died last winter, and was, in accordance to his wishes, cremated. His widow, who felt placed the terra-cotta urn containing his ashes on the parlor mantel, between two vases of gold lithographs. Last Friday morning the new domestic, while dusting, knocked both pot and Potter to the floor. The ashes, in wild desire to get a sniff of fresh air, formed of the cover and spread out, like the geese in the Arabian tale, till they filled every corner of the room, and, tickling the servant's nose, caused her a tremendous fit of sneezing. "Sure, and it's a queer place to keep the pepper," she remarked to herself and restored the urn, with the remaining dust to the mantel.

When preparing dinner she found the pepper-caster needed replenishing, and, having none of the condiment in the spice-closet, bethought her of the pepper-pot in the parlor; which furnished her a sufficient quantity. After dinner had reached the second course the widow, with a plaintive sniff, declared that "nothin' in the air reminds me of James. I can really smell his breath. Just as it used to be when he came home from the lodge." A young man who boards with Mrs. Potter finally observed that "This pepper's pretty white, and I can't see that it smells any more."

The servant, on being questioned, explained that "the pepper was all out and there was some in the stone crock in the parlor." "What do you mean?" inquired the widow; "there's no crock in the parlor." "Then I put some pepper from the urn around it." The widow, who had perished of her husband sprinkled on a dish of omelette, here shrieked and fainted while the young man who had eaten about an omelette of Mr. Potter with his beefsteak, turned pale and rushed away to a physician. The new servant came to them after finishing but firmly ordered the domestic to pack up her trunk, and Mr. Potter now repose at the bottom of a chest in the garret.

A Telegraphist's Dilemma.

"I went to send a message in a great hurry.

The Western Union operator braced himself for a "rush message.

"To what place?"

"Well, we have no open wire to Chicago; "Can you send it right away?"

"Yes madam.

"Well, you see, Emma's baby is sick, and Charley is away on a trip."

"What shall I say, madam?

"You see, we don't think just where he is, you couldn't tell!"

The operator had to admit that he could not.

"Well, suppose you send it to Chicago?"

"Well, suppose you do. Where is he?"

"Suppose you take a Chicago Directory, and?

"Yes ma'am" (handful to hay)

"I am afraid I have forgotten the address.

"What business is he in?

"I don't know; he makes a good living though. Don't you think a telegram addressed to Chicago would reach him?

"I'm afraid not."

"Well, then, I'll go home and find out his address. Can you tell me the nearest car that will take me home?"

"No ma'am I cannot."

"Well, it seems queer to me that you telegraph operators don't know anything."

An Even Jury.

Clerk of Court—"Well, gentlemen of the jury, have you agreed upon a verdict."

Foreman—"We have.

Clerk—"What say you! Do you find the prisoner at the bar guilty or not guilty?"

Foreman—"We do."

Clerk—"You do. Do what?"

Foreman—"We find the prisoner at the bar guilty, or not guilty."

Clerk—"But, gentlemen, you must explain.

Foreman—"Of course! You are six of us find him guilty, and six of us find him not guilty, so we've agreed—to let it go at that.

A Rare Old Dormant.

Senator Stockbridge of Michigan is something of a wag. He was sitting in his committee room the other day when one of those fellows who are always demanding documents came in. The caller had secured almost every book, pamphlet, and bill which the Government magnanimously prints and gives away. But he still longed for more.

"I am very anxious," said he, "to secure a copy of the Constitution of the United States. Could I obtain your help, Senator?"

"Why, certainly; but it would be useless. The officer will be liable."

"Indeed. And why?"

"Well, you see, there were so many demands from people like yourself for copies of this good work that the supply soon ran out. There was one copy left, and the President has just sent that to the Pope."

He was "Be Boss."

Some time ago a colored man contracted with Capt. F. M. McKinney to do some repairing on a house for the sum of $25. The next day the Captain found the man had hired two hands, who were hard at work, while he was sitting around, giving instructions.

"How much do you pay them?" he was asked.

"Well, sah, I pay one man $10 an' the odder one $15."

"But where does your part of the money come in?"

"Come in! Why! I'se boss—don't you see!"

CAPTAIN S. GREENWOOD,

Master of the Steamship Kenosha.

Above is a recent photograph showing the change in his health. He had been troubled with rheumatism for several years, and was so crippled he could scarcely walk without assistance. He tried to procure Brandreth Pills, but could not get them, and was induced to try Hop Bitters. He used six bottles, when he was able to walk without crutches, and has kept them ever since, and is now in good health. He attributes his recovery to the use of Hop Bitters. All those who know the Captain are astonished at the change in his appearance, and they unanimously add the testimony of their hearty approval of Hop Bitters. Mr. Greenwood is well known in Chicago, where he has been for many years, and is a member of the Board of Trade. He is also well known throughout the State of Michigan, and in the Lake ports of New York and was doing a business in perfect health, I never knew it.

This Steamer is owned principally at Kinbury, Lake and Liberty Streets.

gus, the very words which Patrick and his dear disciple Sechnall heard the angels singing; so that from the time of Patrick to our own, these blessed words have been sung; and in Erin they were accustomed to sing them when the people received the body of Christ in the Holy Communion. The hymn of Saint Sechnall, which he learned from the angels when in company with Saint Patrick, translated, reads thus:

Oh! come, ye holy men,
Christ's holy ministry:
Come, drink the Sacred Blood,
For this is all good.
Sacred by Christ's body,
And saved by His Blood,
Refreshed now and strengthened,
Sing praises to God.

of the work done for Ireland by Saint Patrick; the great work done for America and the United States, through Saint Patrick, by the faithful priests and lay people, remains still to be written. But the sweet burden of this duke of gratitude will enter into many a prayer, and many a hymn of praise, and many a deed of charity in honor of Saint Patrick; and on that last day, when not only the evil deeds of men will be manifested, to the world and their authors punished, but the good deeds of men will be seen in all their beauty, measured in all their greatness, and only raised for their exceeding worth, then will the fulness of glory come to Patrick. Then will he be crowned before his Lord and Saviour, not only for his apostleship, but also for the souls of the hour, and were asleep or had gone home utterly exhausted, the British members would spring to their feet with the hope of proceeding with the business of the House; but the rejection of Jo Biggar was as inevitable as death. With a smile and gentle smile he would rise in his seat at the critical moment, beaming genially on his discomfited opponents, and step the question, he would never caught napping. On one occasion, when the Irish members were fighting in a forlorn hope against over whelming odds, of Jo Biggar, as he is familiarly called, and began an elaborate and profound speech, which consisted mainly of statistics of the most amazing length, breadth, and thickness, based on the Exchequer report of the year 1841. He spoke in a hard, dry, rasping, and metallic voice for four solid hours, until the speaker, in a fit of exhaustion, said feebly, "I do not think I quite understand what the honorable gentleman was saying."

"Ah! that's too bad," said Mr. Biggar, sadly; "I'll have to begin all over again."

He turned back and began his four hours speech at the beginning, but before he had uttered three sentences the whole House arose in a body and rushed away.

Notwithstanding these habits Mr. Biggar seems to be as popular as any member of the House, for he will take any amount of chaff and he has a tongue that is really but never cutting.

DRAWN MICHAEL DAVITT.

Michael Davitt is too well known to need description. His strongly marked aquiline features, closely cropped beard, and intense black eyes are known from one end of America to the other. He is by far the most popular man of the Irish leaders at home. When he walks along the streets of Dublin he is cheered, and the working people have more faith in him than in all the other Irish leaders combined not excepting Mr. Parnell.

Mr. Davitt is one of the people, and the risks he has run in the cause of freedom will, if he survives, place his name in the roll of honor of the people, and the risks he has run in the cause of freedom will, if he survives, place his name in the roll of honor of the people, and the fame of his sufferings will live in the hearts of the people, and the sufferings will live in the hearts of the people, and the sufferings will live in the hearts of the people, and the

The New Bishop of Achonry.

As already announced in the MONITOR, the Vatican has at length pronounced its judgment in an ecclesiastic matter of no ordinary what long standing, and a successor has been found for the Most Rev. Dr. McCormack, in the ancient diocese of Achonry. The new occupant of St. Nath will be the Very Rev. John Lynch, D. D., the esteemed and learned president of the diocesan college, Sligo. The bishop-designate is quite a young man, stalwart and vigorous, his natal year being 1850. He was born in the parish of St. Peter's, Athlone. In 1861, he entered Summer Hill College, whence five years in his turn, he proceeded to Maynooth. His collegiate career was brilliant and distinguished, so much so that in June, 1872, while still one young for ordination, he returned to his old alma mater as professor. He was ordained priest on the 29th of December following. Since then he spent the remaining five ten years (72-72), during which time he had charge of a seminary which was taught by the Christian Brothers under his immediate. Again returning to resume his teaching duties in Summer Hill, he became president of that college in 1880 on the death of its former president Abbé Gillooly, brother of the present Bishop of Elphin. He found the establishment laboring under serious disadvantages. The educational course was limited to Latin and the finances embarrassed, but his energy and enterprise soon effected a beneficial change. In the same year he purchased Castle Forbes House, upon which his rector has proved equally successful. Sligo, with a population of twenty thousand, is rather but too high distinction as an element of poverty and misery. In the national struggle now being so sorely waged the priests of Ireland will no doubt find in him a most efficient colleague and ally. These qualities, combined with his strong natural urbanity and an amiable disposition, augur for him a warm-hearted reception worthy of this, kindly people. Ad multos!

The consecration of Dr. Lynter will probably take place at an early date in the Cathedral at Ballaghaderreen.

Cardinal Manning's Calumniators.

The London correspondent of the Dublin Freeman says they, and Cardinal Manning, the latest person of distinction against whom the Times levels a charge of disloyalty. The Freeman correspondent goes out the vials of his wrath on his Eminence, declaring that his influence has been used at the Vatican to support the Irish Hierarchy. The value of that influence is best attested by the outrageous virulence of the attack made upon him in the columns of the leading journal." The same correspondent declares that all the Catholic Bishops of Ireland are selected by the Holy Ghost, and are therefore necessarily disloyal. Without troubling the absorber of this assumption, it may be pointed out that the statement on which it proceeds is false. The Catholic Bishops of Australia were all, with one exception, Irish by birth. That exception is Archbishop Carr, but this is sure enough to the truth for the purpose of the Times.

Sudden and Sad Death.

A Mr. Maguire, an elderly man, of New York, died of heart disease at Dr. McGlynn's meeting on a recent Sunday night. The trustees of Calvary Cemetery refuse to admit his body to be buried in consecrated ground. It seems that the late Mr. Maguire attended the meeting in the capacity of a sympathizer with the doctrines taught by the anathematized, and that he was entirely in sympathy with those of Dr. McGlynn in his disobedience to the laws of the Church. Under late legal decisions, the trustees of Calvary Cemetery cannot be forced to admit Mr. Maguire's body into consecrated ground. A lot bought in a Catholic cemetery is bought subject to the rules of the Church.

Corcoran's Charity.

Mr. W. W. Corcoran bequeathed to St. Vincent's and St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum $2 000 each; to the Little Sisters of the Poor, $3,000, and to the St. Ann's Infant Asylum, $2,000. These sums are to be held and invested by the institutions to which they are severally given, and a selected part of the income therefrom used to furnish the inmates with the usual Christmas and strawberry festivals and feasts commenced by Mr. Corcoran a decade about forty years ago, and continued by him to the present time.

—Among the bills which received the action of Congress recently was one by Mr. Neal, for the relief of the Catholic church of SS. Peter and Paul, Chattanooga, Tenn., and provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized to pay to Most Rev. Patrick A. Feehan, of Nashville, $18,729 09, for stores and other building materials taken during the war. During the time the above claim was instituted, Archbishop Feehan had charge of the Nashville Diocese. When this money comes into his possession it will be turned over to Bishop Rademacher, and by him to Rev. Father Walsh, and applied to the construction of a beautiful new church soon to be built in that city.

Character Sketches of Notable Men.

BILLY JOSEPH BRIGAN.

The personality of this public man of the Irish party may be of some interest to Americans. The personal idiosyncrasies of the professional politicians have as eager, if glamed over as are the peculiarities of the idolons of the United States at home. Ben Backer's artful eye has its prototype in the squinch of Joe Biggar's robes. Biggar is equal with an affection amounting almost to love by the majority of the Irish people. He is small and hump-backed, and is worth nearly a million of our dollars. He is a Member of Parliament, and his greatest distinction is his unvarying pertinacity. He has the rare gift of being able to say what he means, and for the whole of last session he was a flaming menace and terror to easy and every British statesman who attempted to get a bill through Parliament. It was the current supposition that Jo Biggar never slept. He objected to every possible measure that any man of British birth tried to pass. When all the other members of the House, tired out and worn-out, had gone home utterly exhausted, the Irish member was still fresh to their feet with the hope of proceeding with the business of the House; but the objection of Jo Biggar was as inevitable as death. With a noble and gentle soul he would rise in his seat at the critical point, leaning genially on his deadly weapon of parliamentary, and stop the measure. He was never sought napping. On one occasion, when the Irish members were talking for a forlorn hope against overwhelming odds, the Speaker, in a fit of exhaustion, left the chair, and began an elaborate and profound speech, which consisted mainly of statistics of the most amazing length, breadth, and thickness, based on the Kilkenny report of the year 1841. He spoke in a hard, dry, rasping, and metallic voice for four solid hours, until the Speaker, in a fit of exhaustion, said plainly "I do not think I quite understand what the honorable gentleman was saying."

"Ah! that's too bad," said Mr. Biggar sadly; "I'll have to begin all over again."

He turned back and began his four hours speech at the beginning, but before he had uttered three sentences the whole House arose in a body and rushed away.

Notwithstanding these habits Mr. Biggar seems to be as popular as any member of the House, for he will take any amount of chaff, and he has a tongue that is ready but never cutting.

GRAVE MICHAEL DAVITT.

Michael Davitt is too well known to need description. His strongly marked spiritual features, closely cropped beard, and remarkable black eyes are known from one end of America to the other. He is by far the most popular man of the Irish leaders at home. When he walks along the streets of Dublin he is cheered, and the working people have more faith in him than in all the other Irish leaders combined, not excepting Mr. Parnell.

Mr. Davitt is one of the people, and his risks he has run in the cause of freedom make the hearts of such men as the descendants of Brian's and Hugh's seem pumpy and shoddy. Davitt's life and his work are simply a moving book if ever he gets time to write it, but his time is given up wholly to the cause.

MICHAEL DAVITT'S HOME.

Land League Cottage is a cosy, small house, with a nice, but by no means large, stretch of green award bordered with gravel walks and pretty trees such as I saw other places in this country have, spreading away to the rear. The occupants suffer petty annoyance from individuals who are simply nasty and break the limbs of trees, to all of which easy means may be had, for the premises are open day and night for those who desire to enter. One of the means of petty vandalism is the continued defacement of the two granite plates into which are hammered the supports of the main gate. On one of these was painted the words "Land League" and on the other "Cottage" as soon as the property was purchased for Mr. Davitt. A short time intervened, and the inscription was effaced by unknown hands. It was restored, and now several of the letters are rubbed off. To prevent further mischief Mr. Davitt intends having the title cut into the stone.

Inside the cottage is a model of neatness, and the mistress is a lady worthy of her husband and the country where she was born. A caller is impressed with the modest yet withal, hospitable disposition of the hostess. She has the happy faculty of making every one feel at ease by her unpretentious treatment and appropriate language at timely points. A wall of the parlor holds tokens of dears given Mr Davitt each time he was released from prison. The first one indicated a servitude of over seven years, is faded and crumpled from being thrown in a bucket of water by Davitt after his release from prison while on his way to Ireland on a vessel. Some one saw him toss the document from him and took it from the pail. Looking through the contents of his pocket long after he reached home, the agitator was astonished to find the ticket-of-leave. The rescuer had slipped it into his pocket.

SYMPATHETIC PARMAN.

A distinguished ancestor of Mr. Parnell's was Irish, but he himself is half English and half American, while his ancestor is wholly American. It is customary with the English caricatures to make him a hoary headed man with a very pronounced "lodge" in the region of the waistband, whereas, on the contrary, Mr. Parnell is perfectly straight, lithe, and slender. He has a frank and open manner, a direct way of looking at a question, and is one of the few politicians who will talk for hours entertainingly without touching on a question of claim.

TRESCOTT THE SERAF.

T. C. Healy, who is popularly known as Tim Healy, is the man who once attempted to overthrow Parnell's sway. Parnell had put up Capt. O'Shea for Galway, and there had been a great deal of talk in the opposition papers about the preference which Mr. Parnell exhibited for the society not only of Capt. Shea, but also of Capt. O'Shea himself. The rumor turned out to be groundless, of course, but Parnell put up Capt. O'Shea as member for Galway just at the time that the remarkable Mrs. O'Shea and himself were prevalent. He probably did this so much to show his contempt of such opinion as anything else. However, Mr. T. C. Healy, backed up by Jo Biggar, undertook to make out that Mr. Parnell had made a grievous mistake, and that he should no longer be accepted as the head of the Irish party. They hurried down to Galway, and put up a man named Lynch in opposition to Capt. O'Shea. The papers got out extras, and the streets of London rang with the cry of "Split in the Irish party." Parnell was declared to be overthrown, and Healy and Biggar were declared the future leaders. The Times and other Tory organs exulted over this break in the Irish ranks, and so the matter rested for one day.

Twenty-four hours later Mr. Parnell stepped off the train at Galway and sent for Mr Healy and Mr. Biggar, who were working up the Lynch boom with terrific enthusiasm. Mr Parnell's interview with the rebellious lieutenants lasted exactly five minutes. He returned immediately to London, but before he had been a half hour on his journey Mr Lynch's candidacy was withdrawn, and Messrs. Healy and Biggar returned humbly to Dublin, and Capt. O'Shea was triumphantly elected to Parliament. There has been no talk of a split in the Irish party since that time, but the incident is an example of the remarkable influence which Parnell has over the men who work with him. The leaders of the Home Rule party, 1885, 86 and 87, "so far the people generally, or the parishes, Kerry has done comparatively nothing."

Ilowerick.

The usual season on the Shannon, opened with nothing worse than rain, and though the prospects are good, the expectations are not very sanguine.

A Mitchelstown report we record the death of Mr. J. McCarthy, principal of the firm of T. McCarthy & Sons, extensive merchants, which took place on Feb 19th. Deceased was a member of his family, and a large circle of friends and relatives sympathize with the bereaved family. In the month of July 27th year, had been ill for about a fortnight, and here he suffering with most edifying fortitude.

We regret to have to announce the death at St. John's College Sligo, on Dec 31st, of the Rev. Peter O'Hara, brother of the Rev. James O'Hara, Adm., St. Michael's, Limerick. The young clergyman had only attained his 25th year, and just two years ago he had been raised to the priesthood by the Most Rev. Dr. Mac Hale, Archbishop of Tuam, in the Cathedral of Sligo. The deceased was a young man of great promise, and his untimely death at such a tender age, leaves a void in the hearts of his relatives and friends, which time alone can fill. The young deceased was a nephew of the Very Rev. Canon Fahey, P. P., V. G., Ballinasloe, and a cousin of the Rev. Michael Fahey, C. C., Kilkenna, and Rev. Thomas Fahey, Ballinasloe, and Rev. Martin Fahey, C. C., Ballinasloe, and Rev. Patrick Fahey, C. C., Ballinasloe, and Rev. Patrick Fahey, C. C., Ballinasloe, and Rev. Patrick

(FOR THE MONITOR.)
THE ASSUMPTION.

The time hath come for God to overpower
Dark sin's tyrannic sway;
The mind of God is one, and so that o'er man linear,
By Him be swept away;
And matter for the Death winds that pour
Borrow on Life's short day.

The hour hath come for Him to open fling
The gates of Heaven ajar;
And to the west, the fond Redeemer bring Rebellious, remission war
Visited thy; so that each malcious soul may wing
Its flight to heaven far.

As He hath said, when, in the olden time,
In sages at the Fall,
Primeval man by Satan lured to crime,
Deep spurned his God and all—
Our world arise, who hath wing to His prayer
Would break Death's gloomy thrall.

Long ages past, manikind lived heedless on,
Thoughtless of Him to cease;
Smelling the sponge of the Evil One,
With Death who Godless reign,
Unlimited of love yet so easily was
Is their predestined home.

But now the time was fast approaching near,
For Heaven's redemption Son
All hearts with words of love to fondly cheer,
At Paradise soon was;
Where pure souls dwelt, the clouds of fear,
Like mists fly from the sun.

Within the century Mary prayed,
With soul pure as the snow;
Imploring God who all creation made,
That she in grace might grow,
That in celestial purity, Heaven's Maid,
She'd praise God, ages thro'.

What light celestial breaks upon her now,
Kneeling so humbly there,
Pulsing a golden hale round her brow,
Glowing divinely fair?
While seraphim, from great set canaors throw
A heavenly fragrance rare.

Hail! Mary, full of grace, the Lord's with thee,"
Thus spake the angel bright,
While wonder deep shone from our Mother's eye,
At the strange words and light;
Fair woman, so full of awful mystery
Ne'er beset on human sight.

"Thou art the Mother of the Eternal God,
Thou'rt pure as lilies white,
That voice their spotless hands above the sod,
Clothed with heavenly light,
Guard Jesus till on sinful Earth's abode,
Perpetual shines the Light."

Mary, I, ended with a grace divine,
Humbly Mary, sweet, gave the
"The order of Him," she said, "Be unto His will I will fulfil."
The angel vanished but behind left joy
That made her pure heart thrill.

Oh, Mother! guide our thorny path aright;
Thy tender love will bring
To blinded man, grace, purity and light,
And in our wandering,
Oh! lead us through the gloom of sin's dark night,
To Heaven's King of Kings.

W. CUTHBERTSON.
THE VIRGIN.

One calm and beneficent light in March,
I stayed within a wood,
Where measured low the cooing birds,
In sweet, reflective mood.
The morning skies so pure, so bright,
Soft troubled in the sky,
And seemed to pour into my soul
A flood of sympathy.
Anon, above the hills, I saw
Within the rose light,
A falling star that left behind,
A trail of silver light.

And then my heart was rapt with joy,
As the wise I imagined,
Where on the ground the virgin mose,
Fantastic shadows made.
Soon peaceful sleep fell on my soul,
When lo! in beauty mild,
Appeared in fragrant, heavenly light,
St. Joseph and the Child.
I turned aside my dazzled eyes,
And could not bear the light;
But when St. Joseph spoke, my tears
Were quickly put to flight.

And thus I turned to view again
The lovely vision bright,
That beamed upon my soul like dreams
Of Heaven's delight.
Below them rolled a snowy cloud,
Above the downy grass,
Blow dropping roses, red and white,
In graceful forms were seen;
His face was wreathed with a smile,
And to me, then, he spoke,
While joy from out the Infant's eyes,
In tender radiance broke.

"Oh! then that wasn'frost now," he said,
"Within the wood alone,
To let thy soul in proper second
Like incense to God's throne;
I seem this night to help thee now,
And direct when thou wilt ask;
For thou performest with God's true love
The Father's daily task."
Then down I knelt and kissed the ground,
And wept a flood of tears;
While to my mouth my hand did leap
With mingled joys and fears.

Then rising with a reverence mild,
Extraordinary I said:
"O thou, my patron saint, one thing
I ask—that I may tread
The same dear path that thou hast trod—
The path of God's sweet love,
That when my spirit bid to fly,
I'll retire with God above,
Then with a gracious smile be pat
The Infant in my arms,
Who smiled upon my raptured soul,
Entranced, with each dear charms.
And as my soul was held in joy,
The Vision paled away,
And through the silent woods I saw
Aurora's morning ray.

HYMN FOR LENT.

Watch, for you know the tempter tries,
By a crafty art and wile,
Look up to God and ask His grace,
Your sorrow help to praise.

Pray when the first temptation comes,
"I will save you many sad many a sin!
For they who pray, and they who watch,
Are sure at last the prize to win.

But if you listen, if you pause,
The wily tempter gains the day,
And leads you on to deeper guilt,
And then to steeper way;
He is God's foe, he must be poor,
He knows not you will win the fight;
The harder he is yield to sin
Then 'tis to battle for the right.

The Conversion of the Carolans.

An Irish-American Story of Love, Sacrifice and Repentance

WRITTEN FOR THE MONITOR BY MISS M. MCCARTY.

(CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.)

CHAPTER IV.

"Oh, mother! Oh, father! whispered Kathleen, in breathless wonder as the three paused before the great glass doors that divided the vestibule of the church, and her wondering eyes turned to where surfeits of chastened flames glowed in lines of beauty from innumerable candles. Like blossoms of crystal the chandeliers swayed to the light touch of the sexton's taper, and each jet as it was lit, was reflected a thousand times and in a thousand colors in the clear glass pendants. The church was slowly filling with people who scarcely breathed as they passed to the high altar, for they knew the Mass was to commence, wrote Kathleen only saw in it a scene of chaste, artistic loveliness. Ah! to think of candles when the burning flame of love waited to enkindle hearts!

Mrs. Carolan swept by the hush which fell upon the worshippers knelt with a glad sense of protection, filled with a sudden secret hope of good to come. Tears of yearning filled Kathleen's eyes, and she could not gaze at the stream of light which poured upon her from the altar flame.

A sermon was to be preached, and Mrs. Carolan waited with some curiosity the appearance of the preacher.

A young priest clad in the white robes of a Dominican, ascended the pulpit. Mrs. Carolan started as she saw his dark head and graceful form that were so strangely like a picture in her heart; but there was something unlike her picture in his ascetic face and those thoughtful eyes, and she sank back, "Not him, not him, and he had seemed so near to me."

As the preacher began, Mrs. Carolan paid no attention to the words, but only to the rich voice that thrilled her and bore her back to other days and to the youth, who for the proud platoons of his mother and sisters, would ambitiously sway oratory, and tell of the fame he would win one day in the House of Commons.

"Oh! that it might be that for this life lonely and hidden, that my darling had been saved," she murmured.

But the magic of eloquence had come upon this priest, and, startled into realization as to where she was, Mrs. Carolan listened to the fervid exhortation that wonkly impressed her, and drew burning tears from the breast of his people. As Mrs. Carolan listened she came to feel, by an unfathomable instinct, that this was John, her son, and calmly she drank in his words. It was her son, and he had authority and power to teach her, and hour and her new found happiness, but the sight of the priest frustrated her with an abandon of anxiety.

After Mass she found her way to the Priest's house.

"Whom do you wish to see, ma'am," said the little porter, answering her knock.

"Father Stirley, or —"

"Father Carolan," vouthed the mother, with pride thrill in her voice.

"Yes, ma'am," answered the boy.

"Then I will wait," she replied, as she entered a room and sat down.

Then as the child disappeared, she burst into tears, but restrained herself and murmured:

"No, I will—I must be calm."

Her eyes fixed upon the little parlor with its wealth of books, its Sacred Heart that thrilled one strangely with yearning and remorse. Photographs were there in plenty, but the one she instinctively sought was not to be seen. Then to the flower wreathed window she passed where the warm "sun-flooded rose" and faint magnolias breathed languor from their southern hearts.

The door opened behind her, and a kindly voice asked:

"You wish to see me, madam."

"Yes," murmured the lady faintly.

She turned towards the priest. His face expressed a wondrous astonishment; the tears started to his swimming eyes, and he staggered forward; meeting his mother half-way with the cry of "My mother! my darling mother!" Ah! the happiness of that meeting!

In a long and old! how delightful a conversation, it was decided between John and his mother that she would make no explicit explanation to his father. "He is quieter than of old, but has aversion to your religion is no less strong, and he will never forgive what he calls your apostacy."

"Yes, mother, father will relent, but in God's own good time," and Father John's voice trembled yet with the glad surprise.

Kathleen and Isabel met their brother that evening, and another happy scene took place.

"How is it that we never caught a glimpse of you, I only saw a priest they call Father James," asked Kathleen.

"He is the pastor; I am only an assistant, and this is my first mission," said Father John.

Richard Carolan made no comment on the sudden flush of sunshine that streamed through his home, though the girls angered him by almost talking him into their secret, in their persistent discussion of it; but after a time they grew more retired, for a brooding calm fell on their lives.

Mrs Carolan walked with you heart such mornings Mass, watched the evening twilight shadow the mellow light in the little Church, and when in thankful homage she prayed for the boon of Faith her prayer was answered, and Father John baptized her, with only her friends, the Carters, and the pastor present.

The girls were a little shy and did not at once yield, but each passed through her own sweet, and state of trial and faith.

Annie Carter, a lovely Convent girl, fell of the sweetness of her new friends, took them to the Sisters' Convent where she had been educated, and introduced them to them they had ever dreamed of, and ultimately into the Church.

CHAPTER VI.

Two years more had gone by, and Richard Carolan was ill. Tenderly his wife and children nursed him, praying with nervous strength and hope for the final conversion of the remaining member of the house of the Carolans. And it was granted, for one day the sick man whispered, "send for John." He then the waiting son was within the door, and before the father could draw back, he was in the arms of the boy whom he had years ago banished from his sight.

Strengthened, he seemed to get better, and was soon able to sit up.

On a golden evening in July, propped up with pillows, he lay before the open door Father John was with him and Mrs Carolan, and they discussed a letter from the absent boys.

"I would like to see them before I go," the old man said, "Maurice and Owen, and our new daughter—she is not a Catholic, Marion?"

"No—I should think not," hesitatingly, answered Mrs. Carolan.

"We will send for them, father, if you wish. They can soon be here," said Father John.

"Do, and tell them to come quickly. There is little time, and much to be undone," said the father, with an anxious sigh.

"Who is with the girls?" he asked, looking up with a smile, as voices were heard in the garden.

"Gregory Searles," said Father John, smiling gravely at his mother. "He remains with us for his vacation."

"I have heard the name before," continued Mr. Carolan. "Who is he?"

"The brother and son of my two best friends. He is a Journalist, and lately likes to take frequent rests down at the house."

"Ah! I see," indignantly assented the father. "Well, which one does he enjoy his rest with most—Kathleen or Isabel?"

"Isabel," and Mrs Carolan, with a smile, "Kathleen will have a nobler destiny."

And then they went back to the days they had spent together.

"Gregory Searles is a Catholic, of course," said the father.

"Yes sir, and Father John told the story of his friend's life, which is a marked mastery influenced him.

"When I hunted in New York, after working my way over, I started for home and fortune in a large warehouse. There I was promoted to the business office of Mr. Searles. He was poorer then than he is now—though he is not rich, and he employed several clerks. From the first a friendship formed between Francis Searles and myself. We had lost our parents, and were waiting for something better to turn up. Francis wanted to study for the priesthood, and I desired to study law. So constantly were we together, that I think both Mr and Mrs. Searles became a little anxious, and not knowing what kind I might be, asked me to change my uncomfortable boarding house for her home.

"Now, continued Father John, with a smile, "I knew I was in probation. I was still a Protestant. That noble woman was my guardian angel, and almost took the place of my own dear mother. I could not see their lives of faith and duty, and not realize the grandeur of their religion. Then came a Catholic in a dark room that contained only one pictured Gregory Searles was a son of my friend and benefactor. He was a school-boy then." Here Father John stopped speaking, as Gregory Searles himself entered the room with Kathleen and Isabel.

"Aldus, my golden days," he sighed, as he took a chair near Mrs. Carolan. The two boys, as their mother called them, came at her bidding to see their father. Were it not for the anxiety that pressed upon them, it would be a joyous band that gathered house, for the first time in many years.

All were anxious to know Maurice's wife. They found her a lovely American girl, whose nature naivete speedily won their love.

She was a revelation to Mrs. Carolan and the girls with whom she became quite a favorite. Her husband, who had lived under a rigid course of hygiene, was enthusiastic for progress and reform, peculiar to American schools, and, at the conclusion of her visit, had persuaded Mrs. Carolan to decide between adopting one of two professions, literature or law, and then yielding to the persuasion of her wife, Maurice Searles, she married him, and adopted neither.

But she was still a suffragist, and was enthusiastically devoted also to the cause of Temperance.

There is little more for us to add. Richard Carolan died a hopeful Catholic, fortified by the sacraments. "Ah, that I had known in time," he murmured to Catherine, as in his last agony, he looked on his three children who gazed wonder-stricken at him.

Before two more years were past, Kathleen had entered a Convent, under the name of Sister Xavier, and well did she deserve her title; for zeal, and devotion, and sacrifice, the "Apostle of the Indies" sent to his faithful friend. Isabel became Mrs. Searles, and were the rarest crown of a wife's happiness—the first deep love of her husband unlessened, increasing and unalterel.

And Mrs. Carolan spends her time in visiting Isabel and Margery. So the flame of Faith kindled first in John, spread its sanctifying radiance into the hearts of a whole family, and brought happiness and prosperity, and—above these—the hope of eternal salvation, to the Carolans

THE END.

The Nuns of the Twelve Apostles.

An excellent story is told by Father Damen, the Jesuit missionary, of an incident that occurred to him during his missionary labors. While given a mission once in Indiana, he invited any Protestant who chose to visit him after the instruction, and converse on him as they pleased. Accordingly a stalwart Indiana farmer called on Father Damen, for the purpose of putting a few questions to him. The Father asked him was he a Christian. Well, yes. To what denomination do you belong? "Well, I belong to the Church of the Twelve Apostles."

"Indeed, and dark was the night of January, 1?, when an orange girl came upon the house of the priest of a town, and knocked at the door, and demanded admittance. After being admitted, the stranger asked the priest to come by a dead-last, at the same time getting the bellows. It was an ill hmed, dangerous quarter of the town, the priest hesitated. It was late in the night, the old man was unknown to him. Might it not be a ploy? But the old woman begged him the more earnestly to come, with tears, and promised him if he would give the last Sacraments to a poor old woman who is in her agony.

A second duty was concerned. The priest hesitated no longer, but hurriedly dressed himself and followed the messenger. The night was freezing cold, but the old woman did not seem to notice it. He went fast, saying, to reassure the priest, "I will meet you at the door."

The door before which they stopped was that of one of the worst houses in that part of the city, and the priest, who was carrying the Blessed Sacrament, felt afraid for a moment. He knocked, and the door had come to answers, and at a sign from his guide, who was about to leave, he rapped the bell. No answer came. He knocked several times, but all in vain. The priest then said to the guide, "Perhaps the woman is not alive, they will open the door."

He knocked several times, but all in vain. The priest then said to the guide, "Perhaps the woman is not alive, they will open the door."

"Pardon me, reverend sir," said the stranger, "I have just arrived some hundred and ten miles on foot—back—from Almighty, and I must be on my return to-morrow at daylight in the early morning, after a brief rest for—myself and beast. When I reach Wytheville—sixty miles I hoped to find you there to make a request. But you had crossed the mountains fifty miles—more—and something still urged me to follow you. My name is Fitzgerald, a Maryland Catholic. I know my duties, but for years, among strangers, I have been—well, I am poor, reverend sir, do me the favor to receive my confession. My health is very—very—"

"But you will wait and receive Communion at 8 to early Mass" and the priest, "in consideration of your long journey."

"My business is suffering already because of this additional delay, which I must be in Wytheville here. By taking another and shorter route, I hope to reach home tomorrow night."

He fell, with a light heart, reach home safely—but, with his heart broken, he had taken great cold and this headed by him was the cause of his death. He was a Catholic, and in his delirium, he called for a priest, and received the last rites of the Church.

The Church's Strength

A contributor to a little Lake compiled from various sources an interesting statistics of the strength of the Church as represented by the Catholic population of Christendom, derived and by, throughout the world. He gives the following as the result of his statistical calculations to the Pope on the occasion of his jubilee, and the number of priests contained in the Sacred College, and the Bishops, etc. Eight cardinals died during the year, and 17 new ones were created, namely, the cardinal Bishop of Ostia and Velletri, Monsignor Hohenlohe, Monsignor Bilio, Monsignor Bonichi, Monsignor Ferrieri, all deceased, Cardinal Lenis Pallerio and Augustini, Jesuit, Cardinal Bonaparte, Cardinal Bonaparte, Cardinal Bonaparte

EDITORIAL NOTES.

Lent 1888. In preparation for Easter.

to the Phalanx of Israel on slavery and freedom. It will mark the opening of a new era in that vast and sparsely populated empire. Another Israelite on the social question will follow.

—A Turonto dispatch states that the Mowatt cabinet has refused a charter to the "Secular Publishing Company," a concern which proposed propagating infidelity. This official recognition of Christianity is highly creditable to our Ontario neighbors.

—Bishops Ireland and Keane recently had an interview with President Cleveland, and the Chief Magistrate took occasion to assure them of his warm sympathy in the projected Catholic University, and announced his attention of being present at the laying of the corner stone in May.

—The Catholic Voice is the name of a neatly printed Catholic weekly recently established in Los Angeles under the editorial supervision of Mr. Frank H. Robinson. Mr. W. D. S. Harrington has charge of the business department. We wish our new contemporary a prosperous career in the Southern Diocese.

—It is estimated that fully one hundred millions of dollars are drawn by English and Scotch investors as annual interest on their holdings of securities in the United States. Much the largest part of their investments is in railroad shares and bonds, but they have also placed a great deal in lands for farming and stock-raising. Their railroad investments are said to yield an average of about 4½ per cent. per annum, which is not far from twice as much as could be realized from the use of the same capital at home.

—On Sunday the 19th ult, was celebrated in the Hall of the Loggia of St. Peter's the last of the Beatifications to be dismissed during the Pope's Jubilee—that of the Venerable Servant of God Josephine Mary of Saint Agnes—commonly called Inez de Benigamin—professed religious of the Augustinian Order. The Spanish Ambassador to the Holy See, Senor Groizard y Gomez de la Serna, with the whole staff of his Embassy was present at the ceremony, as was also a numerous deputation, ecclesiastical and lay, from the city of Valencia in Spain.

—Rev. T. D. Phillips, an Episcopalian minister, was expelled from the British American Association in Chicago last month for no other reason than because he did not idolize the Public School System! From this latest phase of modern idolatry it would seem that the old-fashioned catechetical question: "Do you believe in God?" will be Public Schools! The devil has many ways of trying to root Christianity out of the world, and the very fact that a Protestant preacher could be expelled from a Protestant society simply because he did not believe in Public Schools, shows plainly that Satan is not without satellites in Chicago.

—The famous Leo Taxil, who has had such experience of the cabala of the Freemasons, is still devoting himself to the task of exposing the tactics of the sect. He has just brought out a new book which has caused a great sensation amongst the Freemasons. The title is Les Frères Moçonnes. In this work M. Taxil gives, in alphabetical order, a list of the sixteen thousand Freemasons in that country, with their names and addresses. It can be easily imagined what herculean labors M. Taxil must have undergone in compiling this book. The volume is the result of three years' patient researches amongst all kinds of Masonic documents.

—Commenting on the action of Mayor Hewitt in refusing to review the Irish procession in New York on St. Patrick's Day, the Catholic Review thus demonstrates the bigotry of this anti-Catholic official: "Last year when he was invited to witness the procession he requested to be excused on the ground that he was suffering from rheumatism. Since that time he gave his official presence to the demonstration of the Italians who celebrated the overthrow of the Pope's temporal power by the troops of Victor Emmanuel, and to other public gatherings not connected with his duty as Mayor. If Mr. Hewitt had always made it a rule to review no parades except those of the militia, the police and the firemen, no objection would be made, but when he draws the line on the Irish, and in the most offensive manner of a gentleman who has cultivated rudeness as a fine art, he justifies the indignation which his singular and disgusting refusal has excited."

—Last week we gave statistics showing that about one-third of the Protestant churches in Maine were closed up in consequence of their being no congregations to fill them. In contrast with this dry-rot of Protestantism we are happy to say that the Catholic Church flourishes in Puritan Maine like a fair olive tree in Jericho! No Catholic Church has ever been closed in Maine for want of priest or congregation. There are at present 63 Catholic churches and chapels in that State, all of them prospering and with a priest to attend each. About thirty years ago—when the two States of Maine and New Hampshire formed the first diocese of Portland—there were in both States five priests to assist the first Bishop; now, there are in the same territory forming two dioceses—in Portland diocese, 65 priests, and in that of Manchester, 53—a total of 118 in both. In Portland, Maine, new churches, schools, houses for the aged, and asylums for orphans, are being constantly opened—by one there bears of any Roman Church or Catholic institution being closed for want of priests or worshipers.

Calumnies Concerning California.

Rev. M. G. Jenkins is a Methodist preacher who recently came to this State for the purpose of "Christianizing California according to the most modern improved methods of money getting Methodism. But when this wandering Wesleyan arrived in our beautiful State he discovered that he did not receive that degree of appreciation which he deemed merited. Consequently, he decided that the time of California from sectarian shows and harried away to Texas where he ventilated his venomous malice against this State and its people in the following fulmination of falsehood which he printed in the Fort Worth, Texas, Gazette:

Rev. M. J. Jenkins of the Methodist Church, who has just returned from California, was not a pleasant reporter yesterday to whom that embassador said: "I am glad I was poor; I wanted some means whereby I might give to the public an account of my experience on the Pacific slope, in the hope that I might be able to deter some others from venturing in search of chowders, comfortless, and utterly desolate as I found California. It is a Christian duty I feel bound to perform to warn all I can from going there. It is not right to let people go there. It is sinful. It is hell! I was then forced by the North Texas Conference of the Methodist Church from North Texas to Bakersfield, a small place in the San Joaquin Valley, about 100 miles from San Francisco. I was there forced into a community rich in all the goods to make life pleasant; but I found the whole country black, barren and desolate, in fact a desert, resembling that part of it which lying from New Mexico to Yuma in fact I believe it to be the same desert that extend only by a narrow belt of arable land. It is the most God-forsaken country of a minister and one such an expressible I ever saw. The ministers were supposed there all those of Protestant denominations being supported by missionary appropriations from the East. The people, actually, take more interest in their church duties than do the people of the East. I was the man to the whole country who wanted me to go to a quiet black, barren and desolate, in fact a desert, resembling that part of

Farm and Home.

Things Worth Knowing.

Soot applied to corns is said to destroy them.

For relief from heartburn or dyspepsia, drink a little cold water in which has been dissolved a teaspoonful of salt.

A refreshing and nourishing drink for an invalid: Stir the yolks of an egg into a glass of lemonade; if this is too rich use more lemonade and less water.

Water that stands in metal tanks of silver plishare without a porcelain lining is unsafe for drinking. The same is true of water that stands for any length of time uncovered in a room.

Sprains cramps every motion, elogs every word. The only way to overcome the fault is to mix constantly in society. The habitual fault-mopper with others will give you the ease and manner that shyness destroys.

Any kind of a bath, or any other process that will produce a general perspiration, and then bring upon a reaction, will cure a cold. Simply inhaling fresh air largely, by deep inspiration, is sufficient to nip an incipient cold in the bud.

Do not begrudge loving deeds and kind words, especially to those who gather with you around the same hearth. In many families a habit of nagging, uncourteous or ill-natured giving, gradually covers the real feeling of love that lies deep beneath.

A correspondent in the Scientific American tells how he got rid of a number of warts upon his hands. Place the thumb upon the wart and press it against the bone. Move the wart back and forth upon the bone until the roots become irritated or sore, when the wart will soon disappear.

At a recent meeting of the London Medical society, Dr. Blake stated that extraction or tension of teeth was unnecessary. He was assisted, he said, to overcome the most desperate case of toothache, unless the disease was connected with rheumatism, by the application of the following remedy to the tooth: Alum, reduced to an impalpable powder, two drachms; camphor, nitrous spirit of ether, seven drachms; mix and apply to a tooth.

When and How to Eat Fruit.

When fruit does harm it is because it is eaten at improper times, in improper quantities, or before it is ripened or fit for the stomach. A distinguished physician has said that if his patients would make a practice of eating a sample of ripe orange every morning before breakfast, from February until June, his practice would be gone. The principal evil is that we do not get enough of fruit; that we injure its finer qualities with sugar, then we drown them in cream. We need the action of the pure fruits in our system, and their cooling corrective influence.

This is the name given by a correspondent to certain farmers who waste valuable time around the stove in a village store. "I'm a rule," the correspondent states truly, "the topics discussed at these gatherings are unpleasant, if not altogether damaging. Often the worst forms of scandale form the chief topics of conversation. Boys, too are attracted by these gatherings and learn vulgarity. Business farmers never haunt such places; they can nearly around their homes. The social circle will give you the ease and manner that shyness destroys.

Family Fun.

Wiping His Gums on the Door mat.

A clergyman who has spent some time in Pennsylvania relates the following story illustrating a peculiarity of speech in that section. The clergyman had just arrived and taken possession of a little country parish, and had been invited to take charge of the funeral of a prominent resident. As he knew nothing about the deceased, he was to be assisted by a farmer of the neighborhood, who was something of an exhorter. The relatives had expected that the service, should not begin until Mr. J. had arrived.

He was a long time coming, and the clergyman began to grow weary, he called one of the family and asked him if he knew where Mr. J. was

"He's come now," was the answer.

"Where is he?" asked the clergyman.

"Down stairs," came the response "wiping his gums on the door mat."

The thought of the reverend agelontors list "wiping his gums on the door mat," filled the young clergyman first with horror, and then with almost uncontrolable amusement. It did not occur to him at first that "gums" in that part of the country meant rubber over shoes.

He Was too Poor to be Sick.

A plainly dressed man, who introduced himself as Mr. John Smith, walked into a doctor's office, and having explained his symptoms, asked the doctor how long it would take to cure him.

The doctor who had treated the visitor with every possible courtesy, replied.

"You will require several years' careful treatment under my personal supervision before you are perfectly well, but I think, Mr. Smith, you will be able to resume your labors in the bank in about two months.

"Doctor you are feeling yourself. I am not South the banker, but Smith the street car driver."

"Is that so! Well, my good fellow, I don't see what you came to me for. There is nothing the matter with you, except that you are not a banker."

A Great Obstacle.

Mr. Tinchaser (who has been announcing pressent in his attentions)—I have not had the pleasure of finding you at home for some time, Mrs. Bond.

Upstart Widow—No. There seems to be an obstacle.

Mr. T.—Can't remove it?

O. W.—Possibly.

Mr. T. (tenderly)—At least let me know what it is.

O. W. (coldly)—The front door!

The Gentle Power Wins.

"John," said Mrs. Billus sweetly, "I have dismissed the hired girl and will do the cooking myself hereafter. It will save us ever so much, and—where are you going, John?"

"I am going down town to have my life insured," replied Mr. Billus, excitedly. "I can't afford to run any risks, Marie.

A few hours later Mrs Billus sat down and wrote as follows:

"Dear Mamma—The plan works to a charm. John is not hard to manage if one goes at him right. The policy is for $10 000 and is made payable to me. The hired girl will come back next week."

"Dry money—change of lit. winds—Do you notice how my head throbs, Miss Julia?"

Sha (Sighy) "Yes, Mr. Sampson."

"And cannot you divine the cause?"

Sha (shyness increasing)—"N-no, Mr. Sampson."

He—"Miss Julia I have—a—a—a—make, will you hear it?"

Sha (shyness becomes painful)—"If you like, Mr. Sampson."

"It was met with some of the boys last night, and it was 2 o'clock when I reached home."

Comfortably Fixed.

Brown—Have you been able to get anything to do yet Jones?

Jones—Yes, I got a nice place last week.

Brown—Good. I'm glad to hear it. I'm doing well myself and I like to see my friends do well. Is it inside work?

Jones—No, outside, I'm collecting for Dropper & Tailor; and by the way, old man, I've got a little bill against you that has been running a long time.

He was Disappointed.

In the chemical laboratory: "Professor, what has become of Tom Appleton? Was he not studying with the same last year?"

"Ah, yes, Appleton—poor fellow! A fine student, but absent-minded in the use of chemicals—very. That disconcertion on the ceiling. Notice it?"

"Yes."

"That's he!"

He Accepted.

"Lemp year is a great snap, isn't it?" remarked Bachelor.

"Just why?" queried Smith.

"A girl proposed to me last night."

"No; you don't say!"

"Yes, and I accepted."

"Worse and more of it. How did it happen?"

"Simplest thing in the world. She proposed to me to leave the house or she would call her father, and I left. That was all!"

MR. JOHN W. FURBUSH,
An Army Veteran,
OF WAKEFIELD,

who has probably suffered more than any man or woman in America to day, Taken sick while in the service of his country, he contracted chronic diarrhoea, the first symptoms for sad. "My head ached and I felt dizzy, I had a little fever at the pit of the stomach, and a bad taste in my mouth, while my skin was parched and burning. I had a dull pain in my back and could not sleep. My bowels were in an awful condition, I lost flesh, and became a mere skeleton. I had a terrible cough, and hemorrhages from the lungs, which drained the remaining strength from my system. I was confined to hospital for months, and was given up by the doctors to die. I was so low that I could not retain food, and I began to feel that I should accompany the grave digger ere long."

In less than 20 minutes physicians attended to my case, and I was soon able to walk from ward to ward without assistance. I gained in flesh and strength every day, and in a short time was able to return to my home, which proved the wonderful power of Hunt's Remedy which from that hour to this has been my family medicine.

This great remedy is absolutely cures all Kidney, Liver and Urinary diseases.

FROM SACRAMENTO.

The New Cathedral Rousing Competition. The Christian Brothers.—St. Patrick's Day Celebration.—

SACRAMENTO, March 19, 1888.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:—

Dear Sir—Knowing that Catholic news from any part of the State is always welcome to your readers, I send you some Sacramento gossiping during a brief sojourn here. It is fifteen years since I was here last, so my recollections of the city were not very vivid. Walking up K street, it was not long before I found myself face to face with the new Cathedral, which is fast approaching completion. The brick work is all finished and from the center of the immense pile, rises the huge dome, surmounted by a cross which is not three towers, so far as the eye can judge, which surround the main building, a wood-work which, however, has been some time twaying from shore. The towers have Seventh street, between J and K. The roof is on, but the blending is not completed. In connection with these towers I may relate the following incident:

Last Friday evening some ardent children of St. Patrick's, who are employed on the building, made up their minds that on St. Patrick's Day a green flag should float from the top of the highest tower. They heated high and low for Erin's banner, but in vain. It was quite dark but they did not despair. A bright idea seized one of them. Some of the girls had given him some green ribbon, and, why not make the flag out of the ribbon? The idea was carried out, and, with only a number of the ground to the summit of the tower, a green flag was seen floating over the top of the wood-work. Who shall say that the Sacramento Irish are not patriotic?

After viewing the magnificent edifice which is, I believe, the only one in the Blessed Sacrament, I noticed, on the opposite corner, the imposing school of the Christian Brothers, and there, right on the corner, stand the well known Reverend Brother Director Chanon, looking hale, hearty as ever. Thousands of your readers have met him and it was only a minute or two afterward, that I was enjoying his hearty congratulations and inquiries of the Brothers. It is to be present at an exhibition, on Friday afternoon, of the pupils' talents, and a pleasanter two hours I have rarely spent. The young ladies Christian Brothers, are really artists, and the addresses and recitations, spoke volumes. The Sacred Twins stand off in the following complimentary terms:

ST. PATRICK'S DAY CELEBRATION.

The students at the Sacramento Institute took that day the lookout, and without waiting for the sun to rise on the "Ith of Ireland" idle pastime, presented a very pleasant programme of musical and literary numbers to their parents and friends yesterday afternoon. The programme commenced with a chorus by the choir, sung to the Patrick and addressed to the Virgin, J. Hennessey. The rest of the programme was as follows: Recitation, "St. Patrick's Day," by M. S. Foley; "The Voice and the Pen," by J. F. Butler; "Upward and Onward," by J. Payne; vocal solo, "Killarney," by Miss Sweeney; recitation, "The Shamrock," Sam-uel F. Bowen and Jerome A. Coughlan; song, "Ireland Mavourneen," by Patrick H. Farrell; chorus, "The Green Shamrock, for Erin's Lyre;" "The Sword of Bunker Hill," by Wm. Hagger; "The Death of Sir John Moore," by Thomas O. Kyne; ballad, "The Dying Warrior," by Harry H. Hennessey; recitation, Alexander J. Fellenzer, James J. Gannon, M. S. Mooney; chorus, "Tailors in the Old Castle (comic); recitation, "Ballads of the Way," by Matthew Dwyer; "The Sons of Erin," by J. H. Hennessey; "The Blessed Virgin's Knight," J. J. Donaghy; "The Little Four-leaved Shamrock," by J. W. Hanford; recitation, "Ireland's Sons," by A. A. Jackson; "Ireland's Ark," by A. Martin and W. T. Sullivan; song, "Ireland Mavourneen," by Master Hugh Gallagher; recitation, "Scott and the Vandals," by F. J. O'Brien; chorus, "Ireland, Ireland," by the choir; "Ireland's Sons," by J. W. Butler; Erin's Defenses," by J. J. Donaghy; vocal solo, "The Harp that Once Thro' Tara's Halls," by Master Hugh Gallagher; "A Noble Race," by C. A. Fraser; recitations, "O'Connell's Last Day," by T. Butler; "Erin's Dead," by J. W. Butler; "Erin's Defenses," by J. J. Donaghy; vocal solo, "Come Back to Erin," by P. H. Farrell; song, "Ireland's Sons," by Wm. H. Murphy, and "Erin's Flag," by J. J. Donaghy; chorus, "Ireland's Sons," by the choir. The author of the "Sacred Twins" is Mr. Cyr. Yes Cyr, "brought the exercises to a close with a very fine Irish jig, which was encored to the delight of the audience.

THANKS TO ZEALOUS FRIENDS

Mr. E. J. Kinsella returned from a very successful tour through Northern counties last week and has forwarded the following list of Monitor subscribers. He has built up a tender one wonders why he did not before—thanks to Rev. Wm. O'Connor, Brother Albert, M. J. Harris and D. Twomey, Stockton; John O Malley and A. J. Lemassey of Alameda, Rev. Father Mahony and Thomas Colbert of Sutter Creek; Jeremiah Murphy and James Mosher of Jackson; and Rev. D. McFeely of San Andreas, through whose generous donations the good work of spreading the light of Catholic literature was so successfully accomplished.

FAIR IN ST. CHARLES BOREOMEO'S PARISH.

As most of our readers already know by announcements previously made in these columns, a grand fair for the benefit of the new church of St. Charles Borromeo, Rev. P. J. Cummins, rector, will be commenced about April 24th, and will last several weeks. The church is nearly finished and funds are seriously needed to defray the building expenses. We trust that every Catholic in this new parish will do his utmost to make the fair a grand success.

Rev. John Brennan late assistant at Sacred Heart Church has been appointed assistant at St. Peter's Church, Potrero, of which Rev. P. O'Connor is rector.

PARISH PERSONALS.

Rev. P. Gallagher of Chicago, a friend of the Rev. John Lynch, arrived in this city last Saturday and is temporarily stopping at the Palace.

—Rev. D. J. Riordan of Chicago preached a masterly sermon last Sunday at St. Mary's Cathedral on the gospel of the day.

—His Grace Archbishop Cleary of Canada, and secretary, were in the city last week. On Sunday last Archbishop Cleary confirmed 75 boys and girls at St. Anthony's Church, Dunbar, and a class of 125 at St. Francis de Sales Church, Oakland.

MONITOR MISCELLANY.

Holy Cross Church, Santa Cruz, is nearing completion. Nothing remains to be done but the plastering and interior finish.

—The new Convent of the Order of Notre Dame at Petaluma is progressing. The concrete foundation is in, and the various sub-contracts have been let.

—Your Ladies' Institute No. 3 has elected the following delegates to the Grand Council: Miss Kate Dwyer, Miss Alice Cullen, Miss Annie E. Daly and Miss Mary Noonan.

—Y. M. I. No. 18, San Rafael, gave an excellent entertainment on the 16th inst., at which Rev. J. F. Sullivan of this city delivered a lecture.

—Several persons have sent in marked copies of anti-Catholic publications this week, which it is intended to use some as we find time and space to give them attention. A fit against the Church can be expected to last but of space, but it may take volumes to refute it, hence Truth sometimes moves slowly. We have all the same to do.

—"The Converted Jew," an original Catholic Story of the Fourth Century, by Rev. J. Gilchrist, "Aunt's Vision," an Original Catholic story of modern day, by "Matalena," and poetical contributions from Miss A. Wynne and other members of the Monitor family, are in posts to our next issue.

—We call the attention of readers of the Monitor resting in the Western Addition to the card of Dr. Spun, who is another of the best and well-selected drug stores at 1847 Fillmore street (U. W. cor. of Fillmore and Haight), and has a practical chemist and druggist of long experience in charge, is prepared to compound medicinally and confidently commend him to our readers for their patronage.

—The National Surgical Institute, 319 Bush street, is the Western Division of the S. S. Institute of Indianapolis and Philadelphia, which is so celebrated for the cure of all deformities and lameness, diseases of the spine, hip, knee, ankle, club foot, wry neck, spinal curvature, rheumatism and tumors. Call or write, and examine facilities for curing them. Deformities and lameness will disappear.

—Capt. W. L. Merry, President of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, will contribute an exceedingly valuable article to the April issue of the Monitor, on "San Francisco Commerce Past, Present, and Future." Transportation, commerce, and the civic duties of commerce are all treated. There is no better authority on these points.

Entertainment at Sacramento.

The Sacramento branch of the Catholic Mutual Beneficial Association, will give a grand entertainment and ball on Thursday evening, April 5th, for the benefit of the Sisters of Mercy in charge of St. Joseph's Academy. Rev. J. P. McNally, President of this valuable society, is at the head of the committee of arrangements. The Sacramento Union says: "The entertainment will set a large amount for the Sisters.

THE WEEK'S NEWS
—FROM— IRELAND.
IRISH NEWS BY MAIL.

Antrim.

In Belfast, on Sunday, Feb. 19th, during the earlier portion of the service at St. Joseph's Church considerable alarm was created among the congregation by the appearance of flames issuing from the immediate vicinity of the fire hearth. The Fire Brigade was immediately summoned and arrived in a short time, and by energetic work succeeded in cutting off the flames before they reached any magnitude. The damage done is very slight.

On Tuesday, Feb. 21st, news reached Belfast, that an extensive landslip had taken place near Glenarm, on the County Antrim Coast, and that a village was carried into the Irish Sea at Straidowy, a small village near that town, which, during the night, was visited by a very steady moving land slide, the inhabitants of the village had to leave their dwellings in the middle of the night, and the Fire Brigade was called up, and got at present engaged in clearing away the debris.

Clare.

Between 40 and 50 per cent, is the standard in rent reductions adopted by the Clare Sub-Commission. In a few instances reductions of 60 per cent. have been granted. The Sub-Commission has decided that the tenants should be allowed a fair rent, which should be combination by their only landlord, and the tenants should be allowed to be dismissed as the worst criminals. And yet we are told that only Arthur Balfour knows what justice, or the judicial tribunal decides.

Cork.

At the Cork Police Office, on Feb. 21st, Mr. Hurley, Inspector, Bridge Street, Bandon, charged with having a green flag flying from a flag staff on the roof of his house, on St. Patrick's Day. The prisoner said that he did which the flag was put up, and that he was not in another party, and the magistrate, after hearing the case, dismissed the case.

A Cork paper publishes a sensational story, which was recently circulated at Waterspringhill, has received a letter from a person who signs himself "Cork" and who is a member of the Irish Republican Brotherhood, in which he says:

On Feb 20th, at Skibbereen, the interment took place of Mr. Timothy Donovan, Rockery Castlewemond, who lived to the ripe old age of 97 years. When the Rev Father Theobald, of the Heroic Apostle of Temperance, the last of the honest priests of Ireland, who had the honor to be buried in the cemetery in which his ancestors had fought a resistance till death. His Grace Dr. Gillooly, Archbishop of Cashel, was present at the funeral.

The announcements of the late Ven. Peter O'Mara, Archpriest of the diocese of Mathurna, with a few of close mass, All Hallows and his native city, Cork, have heard with the heartiest regret of his death. He was a man of very amiable and lovable character. His brother, Rev. David O'Mara, was secretary to Father Matthew, whom he accompanied in his temperance mission to the United States; subsequently settling down in Cork.

The following is the announcement of the Rev. Wm. Hagerty, President of St. Colman's College, Fermoy: "Ordained only some four or five years ago and during the intervals acting as Dean of St. Colman's, Father Hagerty made for himself a name of friends. The Very Rev. Dr. Wagner, P. P. Mallow, presided at the Office celebrated on Feb. 17th, the chanters being Sir Canons O'Donnchoe and Rev J. D. Seaton, both of Clonmacnoise. High Mass was celebrated by the Rev. D. O'Connell, P. P., Kildorney; Deacon, Rev. P. D. O'Connell, Castlecomer; Sub Deacon, Rev. S. Morrison, Mitchelstown; Master of Ceremonies, Rev. Michael Ryan, Fermoy the funeral procession was formed, and the remains of the late Archpriest, Mr. Hayes, Hire the last rites were performed by the Archbishop of Cashel, the coffin was lowered into the grave.—R. I. P.

Mr. Michael Kennedy, C. C., Mallow, was ordained Priest by Archbishop Kennedy, C. C., Mallow, Cork, on a charge of stealing, the operation of a Bishop of Cashel, Dr. Gillooly, in the presence of a Bishop of his neighbors, John Cotter, Cornelius McCarthy, John Hayes, Philip Lane, Cornelius McAuliffe, John Hayes, Philip Lane, Cornelius McAuliffe, John Hayes, Philip Lane, Cornelius McAuliffe, John Hayes, Philip Lane, and it is no wonder that they are proud to go to prison for such a noble young priest. On the application of counsel for the defendants the case was stated for the superior courts on points of law.

Donegal.

The Land Commission for this county Donegal has granted reductions averaging 25 per cent. to the tenants, Thomas Gallagher of Claughaun and neighboring landlords in the Glenties district, Kilcar, Kilcarrigan and Ballyness, and Ballyness. Take been granted an abatement of over 40 per cent.

Dublin.

The publication of the Dublin Evening News has been suspended, and the Dublin Irish Times office, has been discontinued. It is stated that this is preliminary to the issue of the Irish Times into a limited liability company.

The Dublin Corporation meeting on the 20th ult. Feb. 20th, of the Rev William Portlaoise, R. J., the 14th year of the Lord Mayor's Sunday was released and released at Maynooth College. He began his studies in Dublin and was ordained Priest in the diocese of Armagh. Even to the present day, in Dublin, he is known by his Christian and his holiness, lives almost as from as when he left Maynooth to go to join the ranks of the great Society of Jesus.

Down.

The Rev. Jas. M. Mooney, P. P., V. G. Clonduff, Hillsborough, one of the most pious, real, and learned priests of the Irish Church, died on Tuesday, Feb. 21st, aged 76 years. He was a native of Ballymoyle, and the eldest of Vicar Hill Seminary, opened under the patronage of his late uncle, Rev. Jas. Mooney, P. P. Dublin, he was ordained in 1844. After a short and successful mission, he was appointed Professor of Dogmatic Theology, and Canonist, he was chosen to the parish of Clonduff, in 1856, and succeeded the late Canon Lynch, P. P. Clonduff, Kilkeel, Kilcoo, Rathfriland, and Ballymoyle, he was the author of the Rosary, Bishop of Dromore.

A TRIBUTE TO ERIN.

When so many bards have praised thee
In melodious lyric strains
With thou lilean, goddess Erin,
To a noble lay of mine!
Spirit whose presence unity of sphere
Of thy silvery laying sea,
Decked in emerald robes of splendor,
With thou hear a strain from me?
Ah! upon the air are floating
Rare melodies I ween;
Wafting sonorous tone harmonious
Measures to thy varied gems;
Strains of praise that tell thy story,
Riding o'er the land to-day!
Poets, orators and statesmen,
To thy mantle homage pay.

As I list to them enraptured,
Fain to strike the thrilling notes,
And to breath the charm to music
Which o'er all my spirits floats;
How I long to join the chorus
Of thy children's praises sweet;
To ach the lowest hard among them,
I would humbly at thy feet
Tell what others oft have uttered,
For the age cannot die
O'er the glory of the minstrel,
Or the pathos of his hymn;
While the world is gladly ringing
With thy patriot sons' harrah,
And each honest heart is singing:
"Erin, shamrock go brash!"

Land of glorious Saint Patrick,
Blest Apostle, first to hear
Through the gloom the glorious standard,
Hope of Christians' heart; prayer;
With the reign of Faith the purest,
Satan's sway forever ceased,
Calvary's sacrifice replacing
Druid rite and ghastly feast.
Why should Erin mourn in sorrow,
And why bend her royal brow?
Is not Israel's God of battle,
God of Erin even now?
Take thy harp, O noble daughter,
Take it from the willow tree;
For the Truth thy fathers cherished,
Will forever make thee free!

Land of promise! Earthly Eden!
Land of peace and of cease;
There's a hymn in every mountain,
And in lightly glides along;
There's a prayer in breeze and zephyr,
And a world of harmony
Mingles with the sparkling waters
Of the Shannon and the Lee.
Still the Muses love to linger
In each peaceful glen and dale,
Resulting in the holy silence
Of every lovely vale!

Land of heroes! land of martyrs!
Heaven alone thy grandest pelals,
For thy glory is separate—
Isle of beauty, isle of valors!

HAIL, VERNAL SPRING.

Hail, gentle Spring,
We joyous hail thee
And wish thee welcome with a cheer:
Thy presence bright,
Dazzling as light,
Sheds splendor on the infant year.

Dark clouds upon the mountain's brow,
Have vanished one by one;
The sunlight smile, with its silvery glow
Has melted beath the sun.
Now decay forms traverse the sky,
The sun his head appears;
The tuneful deep has sent to sleep,
All labor's hard appears.
Sweet Nature's form from its bonds,
In obeying accents sing;
To rest its cloak it laughs aloud,
And hails the glorious Spring.
The shady groves like heaven above,
With magic mode sing;
The warbling rays of these golden days
Proclaim the birth of Spring.
My heart with serene bosom,
Yet with deep pleasure turns
Fond Memory's home beloved with tears;
To Life's sweet Spring—
The joyful Spring—
The smiling hours of Life's May-morn,
That sweetly cheered my childhood's years.

II.

Hail, earth-reviving Spring
The teeming joys you bring,
While circle the land with the waves of delight;
Before you fleet sorrows wrath,
The delight of Winter's wrath
Speeds heedlessly to the realms of night.

The landscape decked with brilliant green,
Is flanked by Spring's daft hand;
Sheaves down the gladdened ground
The wealth at her mom and.
The tender flowers from their parent plants
Strike forth in beauty's bloom;
Their rays are sweet, the air they greet
With the balmiest of perfume.
The acorn'ring streams a lullaby sing
To the gentle of the wind;
That charmed with soul, murmurs gently along,
Leaving a freshness behind.
With love remain, oh, gentle Spring,
And wan with thy warbled earth;
Your coming makes the languishing world
Feel as if it had birth.
Bright as the gems have overtaken my hand,
Though prickly gray more has fled,
And Life's decline has chilled my veins;
Yet, gentle Spring I'll praise,
And in loving accents raise
My voice in lord triumphant strains.

COUSIN GENEVIEVE.

A little tot broke at my study,
And enters with an air,
Much as grey Moses left when the Mount,
He took his entire leave,
She enters and stands cautiously
Up to me, and jumps on my lap
And whispers, "What are you doing?
Must you be busy all the time of day?
Cousin Jim has a new and how has quantities
Sounds through my cool a chill,
And makes me feel the weakness of my office,
The sadness of my skill.
What! Write a poem of this radiant child,
This masterpiece of Heaven—
This work of the great Poet?—no, no!
Such skill to me is rarely given,
But cannot just fresh from it of when on my knee
She sat, and as I gently stroke
The light hair from her shining baby brow,
Her face here Heaven's look,
Her eyes were large and blue and brilliant
With sweet expectancy
And mine are thick as angel had come down
From Heaven just to talk with me
That as I mused, she stopped her quiet recount,
And I replied: "My cousin Genevieve,
You are a poem in yourself,
I cannot write of you."
And pleased she hung her little head
And as I looked I saw two pearly tears
Which down her crimson cheeks had fled
But so finely through tears she smiled and said,
"Did you write poems, last He?" "Yes," said I.
And thought that ill could this sweet spirits
With loss of earth those of delight
"Dos he? who mine if so, tell, and her face
Looked radiant with new joy
While I felt that I was quite near to God,
Were I charged Genevieve to see with a kiss

The Converted Jew.

A TALE OF THE FOURTH CENTURY, WRITTEN FOR THE MONITOR BY J. T. COPTHORNE.

Hieronius of Bassorah! With that name the gaunt, fleet figure of a vague, antiquated man forms into shape. A face, deep grey by the touch of time yet smooth, yet peering, overarched by shaggy eyebrows; lips exceedingly protruded; a sorrowful look that betokened some deep internal anguish; I lay bare that revealed the snow in whiteness; and there we have a faint image of this quaint, odd character. His age no one knew. He had lived at Bassorah for centuries, some said. Who he was, what he was, or who were his ancestors, were questions clouded in impenetrable mystery. But by a certain peculiar cast of countenance, all claimed him a Jew. But why, they asked, did he frequent the gatherings of the Christians? His raiment as poor and scarce protected his attenuated body; and his face, beneath the scorching rays of a Mesopotamian sun, had assumed a yellowish hue. He lived in a dilapidated house a few miles from the town, surrounded by a boundless waste of level country, on whose surface not a living thing could thrive and flourish. No rain had ever satiated the thirsty ground. The heavy rain-charged clouds would scornfully pass by this barren land and shower their blessing on the country some miles distant. A strange occurrence, indeed, yet such is the fact. Both man and Heaven seemed to dislike this especial part of the earth.

Daily through the streets of Bassorah, Hieronius carried his little bundle of wares. The children thronged about him and minded not his care-worn face, or his time-faded garments, for his little presents and his kind fatherly talk had an irresistable attraction for them. But to the youths, his barbarous appearance always provoked a smile of mingled contempt and pity; and occasioned the flow of insulting wit. From house to house he would go, the occupants always greeted with the same inquiry: "Any wares to-day?" Some of the kind hearted people would purchase a few trifles, and try to ascertain who he was and where he came from. But a grave shake of his aged head was his only answer. Others would rudely slam the door in the old man's face, or in angry tone and threatening posture would cry: "Begone, begone." Not a word of resentment ever escaped the lips of Hieronius. With bowed head he patiently suffered all the rude rebuffs and contemptuous scoffs of the careless people.

One day in summer, while the sun was rolling down fierce torrents of heat upon the city, Hieronius in his accustomed sauntering, happened, when near the outskirts of the city, to espy a poor, ragged little urchin, lying prone on his back, gasping in all the throes of death. Quickly hurrying to him, he found that his leg was broken, and the pain was excruciating. Tenderly lifting him, he slowly returned to his home in the wilderness, placed him on a rude couch and bandaged his broken leg. Not till the following day did the little fellow return to consciousness. The moment he opened his eyes he struck way, and his wondering eyes seemed to question Hieronius how came he to be lying on the couch in this house. "Do you feel any better, my little man?" Hieronius asked. "Yes, much so," he replied, "but how did I come to get here, and why do I feel so tired?" The voice was an exceedingly sweet one, but the childish face told of weak, shelter and sorrow. The brow of Hieronius was for a moment clouded as if some long-forgotten, one shaded for thought had swooped through his brain, but the next instant, a smile—an unusual thing—flitted across his face, and he tenderly answered his inquiry of the child. "Were you not thrown from your horse, and did you not?"—"Why, yes, I remember it all," interrupted the boy, "and how that terrible man with the gay horses drove me down, and his chariot passed over my leg. I knew him and I will have revenge." "Hush! hush!" said Hieronius, but the child heard him not. "Many a time on the noble plains have I seen him sitting and laughing among a band of rich men, and when the little beggar boy would timidly ask him for bread, would order his soldiers dressed slaves to put me out of sight, and would scornfully throw a large morsel of meat to the sensuous dog that watched behind him. Twas he that injured me and made me an object of laughter to the people. But when I'm a man," and he pronounced the words through his teeth, "I will seek revenge, and then he will be sorry he ever hurt me." "My dear little child," said Hieronius, "you must not speak that way. It is wrong. And your heavenly Father will not be pleased." "My father, did you know him, sir?" said Hilary—the boy's name—in astonishment. "He died, oh! so long ago in Hamrah, and my mother died but a few years after. I am glad you know my father." "Not your earthly but your heavenly Father," Hieronius softingly said. The boy expressed greater astonishment. "Have I not fathers them?" Hieronius immediately perceived that the little fellow knew nothing of that or religion, but was stuck in pagan darkness. "We will talk of that some other time, my lady, and now I will get you something to eat, for you must be hungry after your long fast." After getting him food, Hieronius made his daily round through the city. It was noised by the people that his step was firmer, and his voice more musical, and stranger yet—a thing outlivered for many years—there was a perceptual smile on his face that day. Something remarkable must have happened the old man, the people whispered to each other. What wonder they all asked. But like everything pertaining to He-mim, it was shrouded in gloom. He for receive a fortune! Oh, no, some replied, he is simply entering his second childhood, so being delayed, when one magician himself again a boy, and assumes the gaiety and light-heartedness of youth. His fate they were from the truth much by a score.

That evening, Hieronius returned to find the boy much better, but he injured leg was progressing slowly. "Good evening, father," said the boy Hilary, as Hieronius entered. He had asked permission to use that endearing appellative, and Hieronius did not refuse.

As night was fast approaching, Hieronius drew his stool near the bed of the boy, where the flickering rays of a small tallow candle fell full on the young face of Hilary. "Where is my other father that you are going to tell me about," said Hilary. "You have not forgotten, I hey," replied Hieronius. "Oh, no, I have been thinking and thinking over him ever since you left, and I cannot remember ever seeing him in my life." "Hey, do you know who you are?" "Why, terrible looking stone man in the temple!" "No, no, Hilary they—the people—made that themselves, and how can they make God! My boy, there is but one God and He is up in heaven, where He sees all things, and hears all things and He will punish us if we are bad, but will bring us to Heaven—oh, a most beautiful place—if we do not offend Him." "But I never saw Him!" "No, my boy, not with mortal eyes can you see Him. His brightness is so intense, that a glance at Him would blind us. His a spirit, and not till we shed down the soul behold Him." "What is the soul, father?" "It is a spirit like God, but unlike Him, it was created and made immortal by the goodness of our Maker." There was then a silence. Hilary gazed with fixed eye at the ceiling, in utter wonder over the things that Hieronius had told him. He believed, his every child, the mysteries that he heard, though he puzzled his little brain to understand, to find out their true meaning. Hieronius gazed quietly on the boy, and the smile that in his countenance was so strangely attractive, that his unpresessing face would not be noticed, under the beauty of the smile. Hieronius broke the reverie. "Hilary, how old are you?" The boy quickly turned his head and answered: "I will soon be fourteen." "Fourteen" murmured Hieronius to himself, he looks to be twenty ten than fourteen. "And you were born in this town, fourteen years ago." "Yes, father." "Did you ever go to school, Hilary, resumed the old man. "I went for nearly four years to the school on Alexandrian street,"—a pagan one—"and I studied very hard. The teacher liked me and said I would be a great man some day. But when mother died I had to leave and beg through Bassorah for bread, for I could obtain no work, nor could I do much." "That is good, Hilary, and you will be a great man yet, if you do what I tell you." "Yes, I am glad you know my father." "Not your earthly but your heavenly Father," Hieronius softingly said. The boy expressed greater astonishment. "Have I not fathers them?" Hieronius immediately perceived that the little fellow knew nothing of that or religion, but was stuck in pagan darkness. "We will talk of that some other time, my lady, and now I will get you something to eat, for you must be hungry after your long fast." After getting him food, Hieronius made his daily round through the city. The tide of immigration is again at flood, during 1887, 699,581 Russians fled from Czardom, and 1,000,000 Germans left the Fatherland. Of these immigrants, 1,000,000 have settled in the United States than anywhere else in the world, and proceed to by transferring their allegiance from several decrepit kingdoms to the robust Uncle Sam, for whom strapped Germany is already assembling troops to wrest a fair share of the spoils. The result of the United States has been more numerously recruited in earlier years, but not often. In 1881, 720,000 immigrants arrived, and in 1882 there were 788,992. That was the top figure since 1873.

A closer study of figures, dry in themselves, is fruitful of singular contrasts and lays bare not a few skeletons in national closets. Prussia approaches nearer to 38,000,000 inhabitants than does the United Kingdom. Yet in 1887, 177,663 Britons (including Irishmen) forsook their native land, while nearly all Frenchmen preferred to stay at home, the exceptions numbering only 5,559. That this disproportion is not casual is proved by examining the record for many years. There are fluctuations, of course, but not in any year since 1873 have more 19,872 Frenchmen left home for lands. Even that figure republic, Switzerland, sent no more than 6,000, and the 6,000 Germans with the immigrating Germans (111,203, 241) is almost as great as the 6,000 Frenchmen. What makes this all the more significant is that the Prussian knows the most reckless and enterprising people in the world. They die in Tongan as readily as they fight in Africa, and in 1887 they sent four of millions to Texas, and their hatchets of industry many of millions to Brazil, for example that of the Baron of Hogg, 20 million, just as they have sent with 11,000,000 Germans, and 3,000 thousands, among the other sacred territories are many equally costly. Tom Daniel de Hamburg, 13 M F O, Confessor to his holiness, Pope Leo XIII, is a Hebrew possessed with the gift of fifty tongues, specially practice in the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Arabic, and Sanskrit. THE CAUSE OF CRIME.

A Protestant Clergyman Holds that Newspapers and the Law's Delay are to Blame

In the course of a lecture the other night in New York, the Rev. M. Morgan Dix said: "I think, with many others, that the growth of crime is due to just two reasons. The unlimited newspaper publicity given by the press and the slowness of our criminal courts. And first, I arraign the newspaper as a great cause of this evil. But it is said, as it always is and in the defense of the press, that it only reflects the tone of things, and therefore they must have the blame. I think, on the contrary, that the tone of journalism was considerably higher and a higher tone prevailed than one which produced the horrible crimes of the morning.

"Secondly, we attribute these crimes to the law which delays the prompt execution of a righteous sentence. What we want is a fixed law to the effect that the general public that crime will be punished and that the public has a right in mind the belief that morality will surely be followed by a speedy punishment. Let the law be in itself well surely follow his victim into the next world within, say, thirty days of his capture, then and then only will we check this equal growth of crime.

Then another class that ought to be arraigned as demoralizers of the public are those subtly, sentimental philanthropists who ask for autographs, locks of hair, and mementoes from the criminal, while they are petitioning for his release or the commutation of his just sentence. And do not let us forget the funeral honors paid to the thousand murderers this epithesis of all atrocities.

A closer study of figures, dry in themselves, is fruitful of singular contrasts and lays bare not a few skeletons in national closets. Prussia approaches nearer to 38,000,000 inhabitants than does the United Kingdom. Yet in 1887, 177,663 Britons (including Irishmen) forsook their native land, while nearly all Frenchmen preferred to stay at home, the exceptions numbering only 5,559. That this disproportion is not casual is proved by examining the record for many years. There are fluctuations, of course, but not in any year since 1873 have more 19,872 Frenchmen left home for lands. Even that figure republic, Switzerland, sent no more than 6,000, and the 6,000 Germans with the immigrating Germans (111,203, 241) is almost as great as the 6,000 Frenchmen. What makes this all the more significant is that the Prussian knows the most reckless and enterprising people in the world. They die in Tongan as readily as they fight in Africa, and in 1887 they sent four of millions to Texas, and their hatchets of industry many of millions to Brazil, for example that of the Baron of Hogg, 20 million, just as they have sent with 11,000,000 Germans, and 3,000 thousands, among the other sacred territories are many equally costly. Tom Daniel de Hamburg, 13 M F O, Confessor to his holiness, Pope Leo XIII, is a Hebrew possessed with the gift of fifty tongues, specially practice in the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Arabic, and Sanskrit. The Holy Father, great by good with the gift, sustained in receiving it, in the words of St Paul: Superabundantly grateful, to meet fold deliver

THE CAUSE OF CRIME.

A Protestant Clergyman Holds that Newspapers and the Law's Delay are to Blame

In the course of a lecture the other night in New York, the Rev. M. Morgan Dix said: "I think, with many others, that the growth of crime is due to just two reasons. The unlimited newspaper publicity given by the press and the slowness of our criminal courts. And first, I arraign the newspaper as a great cause of this evil. But it is said, as it always is and in the defense of the press, that it only reflects the tone of things, and therefore they must have the blame. I think, on the contrary, that the tone of journalism was considerably higher and a higher tone prevailed than one which produced the horrible crimes of the morning.

"Secondly, we attribute these crimes to the law which delays the prompt execution of a righteous sentence. What we want is a fixed law to the effect that the general public that crime will be punished and that the public has a right in mind the belief that morality will surely be followed by a speedy punishment. Let the law be in itself well surely follow his victim into the next world within, say, thirty days of his capture, then and then only will we check this equal growth of crime.

Then another class that ought to be arraigned as demoralizers of the public are those subtly, sentimental philanthropists who ask for autographs, locks of hair, and mementoes from the criminal, while they are petitioning for his release or the commutation of his just sentence. And do not let us forget the funeral honors paid to the thousand murderers this epithesis of all atrocities.

THE MONITOR.

TWENTY-FIFTH YEAR OF PUBLICATION.

THE MONITOR has the largest circulation of any Religious Paper published on the Pacific Coast.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28, 1888.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

—Spurgeon, the great gun of gospel religion in London, has been converted to the Irish Home Rule cause. We hope he may livelong enough to see Erin's tears changed into smiles and her sorrow turned into joy.

—Archbishop Ryan arrived in New York last Sunday and left for Philadelphia the same evening. His Grace reports the Holy Father as taking great interest in the progress of the Church on this Continent.

—Every Catholic should make the Stations of the Cross on Good Friday, so as to share in some degree with the merits of our Divine Lord's Sufferings and Crucifixion on Calvary.

—More than sixty Irish-American students of the University of Michigan have become members of the Ann Arbor Branch of the I. N. L. since last September. There are more Irish-American attending the University this year than ever before.

—On the recommendation of Bishop Ireland, the Rev. John F. Dolphin, of Hastings, has been appointed by President Cleveland post-chaplain in the United States Army. Father Dolphin is a native of Boston, and was educated in St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, where he was ordained for the Diocese of St. Paul, two years ago.

—Thanks to Oakland friends for copies of Oakland papers containing an account of the recent District meeting of Methodist preachers in that city. Want of room prevents us from noticing in this issue the rabid untruths enunciated by the ranting parsons thereat, but next week (D. v.) we will depict the sewer from which the aforesaid gospel sharps gathered the garbage which they flung at the Catholic Church.

—The Encyclical of the Holy Father, "Liberty," is in press, and will be issued shortly. It is a long document, and treats of the relations between true and false liberty, and is intended to put an end to the doubts and misconceptions prevailing among Catholics. The Encyclical bearing upon the social problems will not yet be issued, as the Pope says: "I am not ready with it as yet, the difficulties are great and numerous, and the subject matter delicate."

—An exhibition of Irish industries is to be held in London in May. The objects of the Exhibition are: (1) To place before the English public a clear view of the prevdominant industries of Ireland; (2) to awaken public interest in the efforts being made to revive her trade; (3) to exhibit to the public thousands of persons in England who have relatives in Ireland, the production of her domestic manufacture and antiquarian industry; (4) to illustrate —Protestant preachers, having lost their influence over the minds of the masses of non-Catholics, are very seriously beginning to use their ministerial powers over the defunct among the lower animal kingdom. A Boston Baptist parson recently preached a funeral sermon over two dead dogs, at the Paine Memorial Hall, in the "Hub", on last Sunday. The harrowed "Hub", on this date made such a burlesque of Christian burial should be spanked by every sect in America, and forkwhich anathemas who fell from the presence of great Pope Protestantism! He would free us the fanatical "Saints" who stamp themselves "ministers of the gospel."

—The Provincetown, Mass., invalid who used the power of the Catholic Church therapeutics he did not great his request to stop the ringing of the church bell, has lost his case. The plaintiff, a young man, had been confined, with a lingering illness, in a house close directly across the street from the church. His physician went to the priest and asked that he would not stop ringing the bell, as owing to the plaintiff's peculiar mental condition it threw him into convulsions. This the defendant refused to do, and this suit was the result. In ordering a judgment for the defendant, the Supreme Court said that the church and the bell were there before the young man, and if he did not like the ringing he had no business to go where it managed him.

—The Rome correspondent of the Dublin Nation thus alludes to Bagnal's contribution to the Vatican Exhibition: "Here we see the different offerings of Bylands and, I must confess, that for sober, correct, and tasteful designs, Irish silks carry clear off the prize. The woven fabrics, its embroideries and church ornaments, for instance, while they display Oriental fancy, are tempered at the same time by European taste. To mention but one of these articles, I may refer to the magnificent gold and silk throne which is in the center of this gallery. It is dead Magrath in style, with its large satin wings, and its cushions and rug so richly worked. It reminds one of the Alastic battery that once rugged in Spain, and which is still to be traced in the vestiges it has left behind.

—The Sacramento Bee is greatly mistaken when it says that there are no feelings of hatred on the part of the Mass for Protestants of any denomination. We have been away, and we find it with all the mental force that has given us, but for heretics as individuals we entertain no feelings whatever save those of charitably pity that they have not received the grace of knowing God's truth. As the Bee has referred to the Monitor in this matter, it may be well to tell our Sacramento contemporary that even erstwhile Christianity is better than no Christianity. The Bee is not only anti-Catholic but it is anti-Christian and is doing its very best to stay Christianity to death in the minds of all its readers.

The Feast of Easter.

"The Festival of Easter," says St. Gregory, "is the solemnity of solemnities, because it raises us from earth into eternity which it enables us to enjoy beforehand by faith, hope and charity." The worthy recepient of Holy Communion at Easter receives a similar pledge of his immortality, and, in union with even Nature itself, the sinner can rise again from the torpidity of sin, to glorious resipiscence, through the life-giving graces derived from the practical operation of our holy faith.

What man or woman calling themselves by the glorious name of Catholic, will refuse to co-operate in the Resurrection of our Divine Redeemer at this holy season, Sex is it, therefore, Catholic fathers and mothers, that you make your Easter duty and that your children and kindred likewise participate in the Eucharistic banquet which fills the heart with peace, the mind with gratitude, and the soul with a profusion of joy that no words can express nor can the mind of man conceive.

God rewards every good act, but the Catholic who refuses to rise at Easter from the torpor in which his sins may have buried his soul, need not expect any blessing from that Heavenly Father who has said: "He that will not hear the Church let him be to thee as the heathen and the publican." The Church of God commands every Catholic to receive Holy Communion "under pain of mortal sin during Easter time," and no time during the Paschal season is more appropriate than the morning of that glorious festival when the Son of God arose from the tomb and manifested his Divine power by achieving a great victory over Death.

The Pope and the Irish Question.

In a recent letter upon the Pope's interest in Ireland's struggle for Home Rule, Monsignor O'Reilly says: "In my letter from Paris I was led by high authority to write that Mr. Gladstone had gone to Rome at the invitation of the Holy Father. The same high authority informed me yesterday that the protracted presence in Rome of the Duke of Norfolk, in consequence of the critical condition of his relative, Cardinal Howard, prevented the visit to the Vatican of the great English statesman. Meanwhile the Pope has declined to accept the proposal made to him by the English Government. He is perfectly aware that the issue of life of the Salisbury Cabinet and of the present Tory Parliament will end with the next general elections, when the return to power of the Liberal party is assured.

The only remedy, as the aged Pope concceives it, for the terrible sufferings of Ireland, is in resisting all settlements to coercion and disorder; in obedience to their religious guides, whose union among themselves, and with their political leaders, will ward off all temptation to open resistance and agrarian crime. The increased vigor of the ecclesiastics in Ireland is only the last expedient to force Leo XIII. to yield. But yield he never will." This is cheering news for the friends of Ireland in every corner of the globe. God bless our glorious Pontiff!

—Cardinal Manning recently said—"A Bad Catholic is the favorite of the world. There is no Bad Catholic with Christ who is not a bad Catholic, with one exception only. A good Catholic is a rebuke to the world, because his life is founded on a high standard. But a bad Catholic, whose life falls below that standard, gives a consolation and a relief to the bad conscience by which the world lives. There is something, however, worse than this. A bad priest is the world's idol. When the world finds a bad priest, it flatters him with all manner of indulgence. Can anything be more in the spirit of the world than this? There is only one thing worse than a bad priest, and that is a bad angel, who fell from the presence of God himself. And the world, in receiving a bad priest with so much love and favor, is acting in accordance with the spirit of the bad angel, who is the god of this world."

—An Exhibition of Irish Lace and Embroideries will be opened by H. H. the Princess Christian at Donegal House, London, early next month. The Cardinal Archbishop will be among the contributors of ecclesiastical lace, and an Irish lace worker will be seen at work on a beautiful piece of new design. The embroideries will include some exquisite examples of ecclesiastical work, for the teaching of which a class of young Irish women has recently been formed at Donegal House under Miss Una Taylor, an accomplished lady, whose originality and skill in this class of work are so well known.

—We learn from our Irish exchanges that the present month has been a phenomenal one in Ireland. One Member of Parliament, Mr. Flynn, has some out of prison on the completion of a sentence of three months' imprisonment, but Mr. Balfour has actually forgotten to "renew the coercion machinery in jail to preserve the balance. The priests, too, have been let above for a whole month, and although a good many humble Irishmen have been deprived of their sheltering roofs for their labor the average, and quite worthy of brutal, dangling Balfour.

—The numerous friends of Most Rev. Archbishop Alemany, D. D., who are scattered all over this coast, will deeply regret to learn that he was so seriously sick during the close of last month that his death was reported throughout Spain, but El Noticiero, published in Valencia, in the vicinity of the Brilliant, contradicts the death report but adds that the venerable Archbishop (now in his 74th year) had been for several weeks confined to his bed. We feel well assured that this sad intelligence will prove more nearly correct than the recent Archbishop's behalf from the Catholic Clergy, Religious and Laity of Christendom, for whom he labored so wearily and well for so many years.

Pray for him living. Pray for him dead; For life health, or his peace, let prayers be said.

—A radiogram from Rome states that it is announced on high authority that the Pope has expressed his chance to write the Irish question in such a manner as to be satisfactory to both the Irish and the English people.

Right Rev. Bishop Marty, of Dakota, is suffering from a lung attack, which we hope will prove a fatal one, as he is the most Christian canons of some of the bravest and most beautiful martyrs that ever died for the Cross. Let us, then, pray that his shine out now their from eternal repetition.

—Some pious, Catholic parents, that Almighty God will not hold you responsible for thus leaving the minds of your children in darkness concerning the loss of Holy Baptism? If you do, you are sadly mistaken. Every Catholic child should have a Saint's name in order to direct

A Valuable Book for Catholics.

VICTORIES OF THE MARTYRS; or, Lives of the Most Celebrated Martyrs of the Church. By St. Alphonsus de Liguori, Doctor of the Church. Edited by Rev. Eugene Grimes, C.SS.R. New York, Cincinnati and Chicago: Benziger Bros., Publishers, 1888.

There are many reasons why this valuable work of religious knowledge should be in the hands of all Catholics, but we will call to the minds of Monitor readers only a few points which should induce them to purchase, to peruse, and to preserve this volume so that their children's children may imbibe portions of the faith-strengthening examples of fortitude with which its pages abound.

In the first place, this precious catalogue of Martyrs was compiled by a great Saint whose writings have been praised by Popes and commended by the Church. Those persons alone would be sufficient to demonstrate to Catholics the necessity for reading this beautiful and highly instructive volume.

In the next place, the contents of the work itself—even if not written by a canonized Doctor of the Church—are of such an instructive character that even its casual reading is certain to infuse every Catholic soul with greater devotion to God, through the admiration which the narrations of the sufferings across as they are vividly depicted by the stylus of a saint in whom soul was constantly absorbed the love and the service of Almighty God.

One of the greatest incentives whereby Catholics can preserve the faith in the souls of themselves and their children is to study the lives of the saints. But alas such literature is looked at as this standard "enlightened age" as "too homely," "too dull," "too uninteresting" to be of any practical use in this gold-seeking and God-forgetting world.

Catholic children no longer hear from the lips of their parents a recounting of the lives of any of the Saints after whom they were Christened as the regenerative water of Baptism were poured upon them. And why this criminal neglect? Simply because Catholic parents themselves are ignorant of the lives and virtues of the Saints whose names they bestow upon their offspring. A child is baptized Agnes, Alphonsus or Andrew, Vincent, George or Henry, Felix, Lucy or Margaret for the worldly-inspired reason that some of the child's parents or relatives happen to be bearers of those names, and the child's mind is left in darkness as to the great lesson it life taught by the renowned servant of God whose name it bears during the whole life is to be passed.

This is one of the reasons why the flash given cold in the hearts of millions of Catholic parents, and why so little of the heroic Christian canons of some of the bravest and most beautiful martyrs that ever died for God's faith, fall away from the Church which alone can save them from eternal perdition.

Pray for him living. Pray for him dead; For life health, or his peace, let prayers be said.

CONTROVERTED POINTS ON CATHOLIC MATTERS.

1. "The End Justifies the Means," or the Moral Code of the Jesuits according to Dr. Littledale "Encyclopedia Britannica," Ninth Edition, Vol. XIII., P. 414.

Dr. Littledale may well claim considerable gratification and honest pride to Catholics to see their Church, whom they love as a mother, and revere as their heavenly appointed guide, holding such an impregnable position even in the eyes of the world, that whenever her enemies attempt to assail her, they must unerringly resort to calumnies, misrepresentations and slanders, the outcome of ignorance or ill-will, and often of both combined. The actions of articles, that we are now submitting to our readers, furnishes an additional proof of the truth of our statement, and the subject matter of the present number is another case in point. Though the abominable slander, that we have undertaken to examine and exonerate in all its bearings in regarding the conscience of men, is generally imputed to the Jesuits, as a specimen of the moral or rather immoral doctrine, which guidance and rules the unfortunate souls, that may happen to fall victims to the misleading influence of Jesuitism, yet it does not require much acumen or extraordinary mental penetration to see that the shafts of our adversaries, though directed against the members of the Society of Jesus, are in reality meant to strike the Roman Catholic Church herself and her teaching authority. The enemies of the one and the other, whenever the case, the enemies of the other, since they cannot strike a blow at the Jesuits without aiming another at the Church, and they know full well that the Society derives its existence and holds its mission. There is no true that, as thoughtful men have been remarked, during the last three centuries the bitterest opponents of the Jesuits have always been the most virulent persecutors of the Roman Church, whether openly or secretly, in accordance with their tactics and schemes. It is one of the many evils of the times that few non-Catholics read in approval, authentic works on the explanations of our doctrines and religious practices, and the defense against the attacks made upon them. Not to speak of other centuries, in the English language there is perhaps no field of religious lores more rich in original and valuable matter of the highest merit than that of controversy or polemics. Bartlemy considers to uniform tissues, as well as the most learned and with a book or pamphlet worthy of notice has appeared during the last hundred years, supposing the first hundred years, supposing the first hundred years, which has not been critically examined, thoroughly scrutinized and triumphantly refuted by Catholic writers. Yet, we have heard people who would refute calumnies, expose misrepresentations, which are buried at our books, and time—few weeks afterwards they re-appear in Catholic publications, which we are compelled to say, why waste the work of time and the time which it takes to present a refutation in the field of labor, for we have to deal with, do not even take the trouble of putting a new face upon the old lucubrations, but reproduce them in the terms, in which they were uttered hundreds of years before, and as frequently disproved and completely answered! Yes, the rule, taken of a calumny is not by conquering it by the defeat of those who have put it in circulation, but by conquering it by the defeat of those who have put it in circulation, but by conquering it by the defeat of those who have put it in circulation, but

Farm and Home.

Worry.

Worry is the cause of more trouble than any other one thing, not excepting alcohol. For it leads to murder, suicide, embezzlements, insanity, family misfortunes, quarrels, and business difficulties. Worried people cannot make good bargains; their judgments become so warped or twisted, through the line too much of the same subject; with those subjects they are no clearer at the end of their thinking than they were at the beginning. There are multitudes of deaths every year attributed to regular special diseases as typhoid fever, dyspepsia, consumption, and heart disease which have for their cause worry. Worry induces such a condition of body that it readily receives the germs of disease.

To one who was accosted one to worry a friend said, who attended the confession to much as possible:—"What was you do if you stopped every time to consider the possibilities of every act. I knew of a woman who walked carefully across a smooth carpeted floor; she fell, broke her hip joint and died in a few days. I knew of a neighbor who ate his dinner and died as he rose from the table. Another went to sleep well but never woke; another rode out and was killed. These instances other instances might be mentioned, for every daily act, if we travelled, or read much, or met many persons.

Occasionally we know people who can truly be called born fretters; they fret at everything, and even dreams and even nights smoothly give them time enough during the week to do all the worrying of which they are capable; as for any one living with them, it is their worst punishment that they have to endure in mortal life.

We daily meet instances show the results of worry; they are careworn and wrinkled, and full of lines. They should be warning to us. If the time and strength spent in worry could be used for self improvement and benefiting those near us, there would be many changes in every community.

Family Matters.

The simplicity of childhood should be carefully preserved. A child should be a child; but this cannot be if it is always with grown-up people.

None are so fond of secrets as those who do not seem to keep them; it will generally be found that such people cover as even as a spendthrift covers money—for the purpose of circulation.

A man who possesses every other title to our respect except that of courtesy is in danger of forfeiting them all. A rude man never always renders a manner inside to others. He is never without the dignity who avoids sounding the dignity of others.

In all our efforts we exhibit ignorance and vice, to aid the feeble to raise the fallen, to restore the erring, to relieve the oppressed we need to look far deeper than the surface facts or actual aids we would banish. "What is the source?" should be our constant inquiry; and against that, when we have found it, should our chief efforts be directed.

Household Hints

—Towels washed with soda water will look like new.

—Zinc is best cleaned with hot soapy water, and then polished with kerosene.

—To remove kerosene stains place a piece of paper over the spot and iron.

—A piece of a net put on the live coals in the stove will clean out the stovepipe.

—Egg shells will clean vinegar or nursing bottles as well as shot, and possess the advantage of always being on hand in every household.

—To test cake in the oven, never insert a broom splinter, but draw it gently forward and put the ear close to the loaf; if it is not done there will be a little spattering sound. When it is thoroughly baked there will be no sound.

—A glue that will resist heat can be made by mixing a handful of quicklime in four ounces of linseed oil, boil to a good thickness, then spread it on thin plates to the shade and it will become very hard, but may easily be dissolved over a fire or glue. A glue which will resist the action of water is made by boiling one pound of glue in two quarts of skimmed milk.

A Pile of "Nots."

David and Dora early decided to have a home. And while they were considering one plan after another, the little wife sought information from every accessible source, concerning the best way to make it comfortable and pleasant. One by one she collected a pile of Nots which were to well it in Among them were the following:

Not to build the house or furnish it out of harmony with our circumstance.

Not to have gingerbread work about or in the house.

Not to allow poor work or items of any kind in its construction.

Not to attempt to vie with rich neighbors.

Not to sacrifice comfort or health to appearance.

Not to make small rooms in order to have many of them.

Not to have living rooms situated on the shady side.

Not to have stationary bowls as brackets of foul air.

Not to follow any plan which would not allow of enlargements or additions.

Not to copy from any other house in the vicinity.

Not to forget that perfect ventilation and plenty of sunshine are as necessary as shelter.

Wisdom.

Self is a poor centre for a man's actions to turn about.

Proud hearts and lofty mountains are always barren.

Grieve on pleasant thoughts in your mind, for pleasant thoughts make pleasant lives.

A sound discretion is not so much indicated by never making a mistake as by never repeating it.

In some moments form your resolution, and in cool moments make that resolution good.

When a rich Quaker was asked the secret of his success in life he answered "Civility."

The man who gives his children habits of industry provides for them better than by giving them a fortune.

Study is the support of youth, the ornament of prosperity, the solace and refuge of adversity, and the comfort of domestic life.

He who seldom thinks of Heaven is not likely to see it there, as the way to hit a mark is to keep the eyes fixed upon it.

Healthfulness of Onions.

A physician says that both children and adults should be encouraged to eat onions and adds: "I challenge the medical faculty or any mother to point out an instance where children have died of diphtheria, scarlatina or agin ship, where onions are always used freely."

—Post-mortem revelations and notions sent to us for publication must be paid for in advance at the rate of ten cents a line. Short sight work make a fine.

Family Fun.

Ordering from a "Tab Dote" Bill.

French is now considered an essential in order in a first-class hotel in Chicago. I stood at the door of the Grand Central Hotel yesterday for a few minutes and heard one of the finest specimens such as should from Paris in the native tongue of the latter. I supposed at first that the chef was a Frenchman and that this was one of Messrs. Drake and Parker's new departures. But when an American spoke and asked a question the clerk switched his tongue on to the Anglo-Saxon with ease and was more voluble than before. I understood later that French is considered a valuable acquisition in a hotel office. My informant said: "You know there was a time when it was considered necessary for a hotel clerk to have a diamond. Well that doesn't count now. He must speak French and speak it intelligently. It is going to be the next great American game to have nothing but French in the hotels, and by and-bye the menus will be French."

The remark reminded me of a recent visit to the Palmer House and a waiter, a colored man in conventional attire, handed a patron a table d'hote bill. The gentleman didn't care for the cold dinner and selected what he wanted.

"You don' keer for de tab dote dinnah, then, sah?" said the waiter.

"I told you what I wanted," returned the gentleman.

"You want dat off de tab dote bill?" queried the waiter.

"I don't care; I suppose so; any way so that I get it."

"Well, sah," replied the waiter, "if you want it off de tab dote you has to take it all; tab dote can't be selected from, sah. Tab dote is French and means the whole hog, sah."

A Square Judge.

Three months ago Abner Logan, a very dark colored man, was sentenced to twenty days in the Hudson Correction. Yesterday he was released, and he came down to the police courts and sought an interview with Justice Maxe.

"Judge," he says with many bows and scrapes, "I wishes to speak to you, and what I regard as an outrage."

"What is it, Abner?"

"Fore provide ago you sentenced me to ninety days in the workhouse. Well, sah, day I got me dar ninety one days."

"This is a serious charge you are making Abner. Are you fortified with facts to prove it?"

"I do, you sah.

"What do you propose doing about it?"

"I dunno, sah. That's what I kim to you for. What kind I do?"

"Hum; well. Ah, I have it. Say nothing about it. Just position it on the next time you are brought up, and I'll give you credit for the odd day."

"Hi—is dat, sah?"

"Well, I'll make your sentence eighty-nine days?"

"Dat's it, Judge; dat's it, shore nuff. You's a square man, you is. Good day, sah. "Good day, Abner."

Then and Now.

Good Citizen (bedtime 1788.) "Have you left the latch string out?"

Wife—"Yes, my dear."

"And placed a candle in the window?"

"Yes."

"Let us pray."

Good Citizen (bedtime 1888)—"Are all the doors and windows locked?"

Wife—"Yes, my dear."

"And the burglar alarm set?"

"It looks all right."

"And the dogs untied?"

"Yes."

"Is my Winchester under the bolster and revolver by my side?"

"Let us pray."

Little Lunglets.

—Mr. Dr Bear—"Miss Emma, perhaps I ought not to call during Lent, for I understand that you deny yourself all amusement!"

Miss Emma—"Yes, I do, Mr Bear, come as often as you like."

—There is a spasmodic paper published in Maine, which has got to be a tri-weekly. It comes out one week and tries to come out the next.

—Countryman (to hotel clerk)—"I reckon you'll have to give me another room, mister."

Clerk—"What is the matter with the one you have?"

"The sign says: 'Don't blow out the gas,' an' I gosh, I can't sleep with all that light in the room."

"I have nothing to say to you, sir," said the man in the prisoner's cell to the clergyman who had come to offer consolation. "I am entirely in the hands of my attorney. "May heaven help you, my friend," said the minister, with deep feeling, as he turned to go."

"I wish you a happy journey!"

"Yes, I'm a-goin' to Boston."

"Well, I wish the tramps would take a notion in their heads to boycott us," joined the old man, musingly.

A young lady who is partly deaf is in the habit of answering "yes" to everything when a gentleman is talking to her, for fear he might propose to her and she not know it.

Mortimer's Wife (to husband)—Will you please put up the stove to-day, dear.

Mortimer (resignedly)—I suppose I will have to.

Wife—And don't forget that you are a mechanic of the pipe, dear.

CAPTAIN S. GREENWOOD,

Master of the Steamship Escorts.

About a year ago I contracted a strange charge in my left side, which got first troublesome when I was heated or strong. My appetite became poor and I lost weight. My friends thought I was in a decline. I had a cough, the back pains, and that the kidneys passed a scalding water. I was so lame in the morning that I could scarcely get out of bed. I was so bloated in the little abdomen. All these were in the morning. I had a dull pain in the region of the kidneys, and they continued all the day. I was nervous, irritable, and had the pictures of health and vigor to be gone. I was induced to try Kidney-Wort, and it has cured me. I can now eat anything I want, and it does me good. I can do a day's work and feel like doing it, and can't tell there is a kidney in me. I am ready to testify to the world that Kidney-Wort is a most valuable medicine. I am 62 years of age, and I feel as well as I did when I was 30. I have kept a livery stable for 30 years, and know what I am talking about when I say Kidney-Wort is the best medicine I ever used.

Kidney-Wort absolutely cures all Kidney, Liver and Urinary Troubles.

OUR SOCIAL LIFE.

Bishop Spalding's Contribution

DECAY OF MORALITY.

Dangers that Threaten American Society.

We present our readers with the following extracts from an article "In Our Social Life Threatened," by Bishop Spalding of Peoria, which appears in the current number of The Forum:

The question, he says, we have to consider is not whether we are advancing or whether the changes which are taking place threaten our national and social life. We are safe in affirming as a general truth that barbarism people perish by violence from without, civilized nations decay from within. The most timid could hardly imagine that we shall be overwhelmed by foreign foes, unless the source of natural life first be tainted and corruption eaten our strength. It is equally plain that many things which are brought forward as symptomatic of declining moral tone and vitality ran hardly deserve serious consideration. The little knots of anarchists in New York and Chicago have really nothing to do with us. They are the birth of social and political conditions other than ours, and the spirit by which they are generated is as foreign to our thought and life as a ward caucus would be to the method of government in the kingdom of Dahomey.

THE ONLY ANARCHISTS

who possibly belong to us are the lynchers and vigilantes, and they pity their trade in the interests of law and order. The fear of immigration, which the half-throwns have intensified, is foolish. Known criminals, idiots and paupers are excluded, and their suffices. For the rest the peasant millions who come hither bring to us the best and purest blood of Europe and of the world; and as the great majority of Germans are of mixed descent, there is no reason for thinking that the intermingling of different noble races on this continent will lead to degeneracy. Rather is it to be believed that a high type of manhood will be the result. Let, then, the disinherited of the earth still seek these shores, and if their children prove wiser and stronger than ours, let them inherit the land. Here is a fair field and while: here are opportunity and invitation to every man to do the best he can.

OF MORMONISM, TOO,

as a national danger, much that is superficial and silly is spoken and written. The Mormons are industrious, sober and thrifty, and their acceptance of polygamy is our only grievance against them. But polygamy, personal? question, we need not fear at all. Even among the Mormons it exists in comparatively few instances. It is a barbarous institution, and is found only where women are held in the bondage of ignorance and servitude. No man who has any regard for his peace and comfort would think of having two wives in a country in which women have become so intelligent and independent that the only way of living happily with them can be to be humbled and obedient. Sensuality with us may be reasonably certain, will not take the form of polygamy. The problem which shall present itself for solution is not whether a man shall have one or several wives, but whether he shall have one or none at all; but whatever the future of Mormonism may be, here in the United States it must cease to be polygamous.

THE EVIL OF INTEMPERANCE.

With clamorous and persistent emphasis it is urged from many sides that drunkenness threatens the ruin of our republic. But whatever opinions we may hold as to the best means of promoting sobriety, there is no question that the evil of intemperance in this country was much greater in the early part of the century than at present, and the wave continues to subside. Also, the historian, has shown that drunkenness is essentially the vice of savages and barbarians; and it is easy to discover in a civilized people that those who are least civilized suffer most from indulgence in drink. Bluntness in opening up new scenes of pleasure and lending diversity to the interest which relish of some of a wearying monotony, helps to liberate us from the sway of appetite, and thus renders the attraction of animal indulgence less irresistible. Then the science to take, which are growing more than abundant, are, at the same time, reasons for sobriety. In no other society are the weak pushed so pitilessly to the wall; do the strong so uniformly succeed; and drink, unless it be pure, when it rarely is, and unless it be used with moderation, which is not the case, is the ruin of the mind, body, dollo the mind, and doubtless the moral sense.

HENCE, TO DRINK IS TO BE A FOOL, is to have in the race for life an unusually step, a fatal weakness, and an inevitable prose, and in the growing light of this truth men are more and more plainly that sequence of this kind is not only wrong but foolish. Hence the voice of public opinion, through whatever organ it utters itself, becomes more and more emphatic in denouncing intemperance. The railway president knows that a glass of whiskey may wreck a train, the shipowner that it may sink a ship, the bank director that it may pick his bank; the clergyman perceives that its use hurts the church, the statesman that it leads to law breaking, and the physician that it undermines health; and even those who feeling most keenly the weight and scarcity of mortal life, would sacrifice almost anything to bring back the careless lightheartedness of the early pagan Greeks, are driven to confess that Bacchus cannot be a helpful god for us.

CONTRASTING LABOR CONDITIONS.

But does not the organization of labor forbode evil? In all ages and countries, he who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow seems happiest, and yet he has not to be forced to work at a master's folding, to be forced to work day by day, or lack shelter and nourishment for himself and his wife and child, this is evil; and the affect and tendency of Christian civilization and popular government, in theory, at least, is to lighten the burden of toil and secure the bread of those who toil with their hands. Hunter declared that the rich are received into the Church only on condition that they become the servants of the poor; and it will not be found possible to reconcile democracy to the accumulation of wealth in the hands of those who refuse to become the benefactors of the people. To seek to improve the condition of working men or working women by all lawful means, whether the effort be made by legislation or by National or State legislatures enlightened by the wisdom of the best and fairest minds, is to do patriotic work, is to labor for peace, is to do what poets for which such a government as ours exists. But will the labor organizations be able to promote the interests of working men?

HE WHO BEARS THE BURDEN

knows how heavy it is, and it surely cannot fail to have that they who equally bote must to our material well being should tell us at what cost of suffering and loss we have comfort and indulge in luxury. We profess to believe that men are brothers and equals, and we thereby commit ourselves to labor to make them so. As yet the science of Christ is false to Christ, and believe that obedience to law is more rash from their own and all men's welfare and a popular government, if it would last must leave nothing undone that may keep such fanatics from becoming impossible. Since the mass of mankind are savages, barbarians, and slaves, it may be that a few and intelligent people, who have learned to look at things as they are, and not as they appear to fleshly eyes in Mammon's temple, ought to abandon elsewhere all the project of under building the nations in the markets of the world. LAWS BEFORE THE FACT. Legislative enactments extend the price of labor, but laws beyond the reach of the whole human race make intellectual, moral and physical degradation inevitable when the working pittance is not paid sufficient hire. May it not be that popular government is imperiled by the existence of manufacturing centres which supply goods to the markets of the world at less cost than they can be made by potatoes and oatcake?

OF THE ONLY REAL QUESTION

which the two great parties have now to join issue upon, what louder is there in either who takes other than a financial and economic view? Might it not be well, having out of question for the moment whether the country shall thereby be made richer or poorer, to consider whether it is wise, in a democratic society and a popular government, to pursue a policy which fosters centres of revolutionary turbulence, intellectual darkness and moral degradation, the only obnoxious result is an increase of paupers and millionaires? It must we, on this vital subject, as in literature and fashion, be only servile imitators of Europe? If the Boston and the Chinese are willing to sell as good tea, why should we not make them without dragging a large portion of our population into ease and misery, why prevent them by a protective tariff? And if we have should throw large numbers of factory hands out of employment, is there not other and more healthful work for these people in a country in which hundreds of thousands of the poor, peasants make homes for themselves every year? And if the poor and laboring classes should depreciate in consequence, but only I would without any pledge that prices would be raised, is there not a world endless even ten years?

THE SOCIAL SUPERFICIAL SENSE, in spite of the philanthropic efforts of individuals, churches and governments, is never low of human hearts is capital, "a collection of men, which, by the wasting of vital forces of individuals, by the weakening of whole generations, by the breaking up of families, by the ruin of morality, and the destruction of the improvement of work, and of the moral energy of society, is imminently peril. The evils which Henry George refers such to our system of land tenure are in fact the results of modern industrialism, and hitherto human wisdom and ingenuity have failed to discover a remedy for what seems to be a rate of constitution. Capital, steam and electricity seem to be controlled by shrewd and rapacious men whose object is gain, act upon a population of operatives like a malarial poison. How can shall we account for the fact that under a popular government, in a country where the measurable resources we have hardly begun to explore, pauperism has become a chronic disease, while in all our great cities and manufacturing centres what seems to be an irreparable conflict between the rich and poor rises like a cyclonic cloud on the horizon?

A DEMOCRACY OVER THE MILLIONS

can nothing at the few now minds, must fatally fall a prey to socialistic, communistic and anarchic turbulence, and though so far there is no proper soil here for such germs to spread, the plant which has in the powers of government to blight soon for people, who, unlike poor, shall only when enlighted lands, that can only when capitalists, the rich and the middle classes, are the only real conservative forces. We forget that democracy is lost a form of government, and a form which in the world's history has been little tried and generally tried with poor success. If we have been able to found a durable state with who, elsewhere and hitherto has been the least stable kind of government, our success is to be attributed to causes some of which have ceased to exist while others are disappearing. Our enormous growth in wealth and population tends to the truth that the only form of government is not to make a country rich and populous, but to establish morality as the foundation of all law. Character, not wealth or numbers, is our social ideal. Good men make a good government and good laws, and where the society rule as with us, the State ought to foster morals, to life and have kinds of work which are most favorable to wisdom and virtue, whether there not only the tendencies of the age, but the deliberate efforts of government are helping to build up centres of population which neither the family, nor religion nor education can preserve from physical, moral and moral degeneracy. And worse than all, even to other such thoughts is to speak in a desert which sends not back even an echo. All that the younger generation can now contend for is whether this or that has been or should have the chance which is really a matter of no concern at all to the nation; but neither them will but only take sides on a question which is concerned urgency and intimately related to the permanence of free institutions.

Death of a Charitable Irishman.

SALEM, Mass., March 31.—Thomas Dodd, a well known and respected citizen of this city, died here yesterday after a short illness. Mr. Dodd was born in Cork, Ireland, in 1818, and came to this country in 1850. He landed in Canada, where he remained a month, afterwards coming to Boston, where he obtained employment on the Boston railroad then in process of construction. He entered the employ of this company in September, 1856, and has been in its service ever since. In August, 1859, he began the first train which ever entered this city and from that time he has been flagman on Mill street crossing, in this city almost without interruption. When he completed his 30 years' service, he had earned a pension, his employers presented him with a purse of $200, and the management of the road gave him an annual pass over the entire road. He then took a vacation of two weeks, the first in his 30 years, and although his life he was a faithful Catholic and a charitable man, he was known to nearly all the Irish emigrants arriving in this city, who never fail to call upon him and their remember with gratitude, the kindness of this humble Irishman. These children are left to pray for the repose of his soul.

Cocoan Cruelty.

The Cocoans, who have recently sent a minister to Washington, are barbarous in their punishments. No crime and prison is complete without an assortment of iron chains, bamboo cells for keeping the feet of offenders, pillories and cachots for sleeping the cabin off the flesh on a table, ropes for sawing the flesh, stocks, boards to lie on, and iron bracelets. Other punishments are suspension by the arms, the bastinado and whip. This humiliating, but not painful mode of punishment, is for a drum to the back of the offender and parades the crime while the drum is beaten as he walks through the streets. The man who strikes his father is labeled, the drum is beaten to death. Formerly, in extreme cases, the culprit was carried down the streets on throat or large cartridge, and he was then beaten till he bleed.

Antrim.

The chairman of the county Mr. Father Stephen Moore, Ballyclare, who died at Hill Town House, Ballyclare, on Friday last, aged 80 years, now estimated at the 201 in the following extent, and the number of Mass Rev Dr. Mahony preached. The funeral Mass was celebrated by Father Dr. Mahony, Father Rochford, Father Hughes, Father Dawson, the Rev. Father Mahony, Father Dawson, and the Rev. Father Morris Master of Ceremonies.

Clare.

On Feb. 26th, the hearing of a prosecution on behalf of Mrs Jessie Whitehead, wife of the Rev. Hugh Arundale Whitehead, for £2,500 for the loss of her husband, who was killed at Ballycastell, on the 11th of September, during the moonlighting raid, came before the Clare circuit court, and having addressed the grand jury on behalf of the plaintiffs, the jury awarded £2,250 to be levied on the county at large.

Cork.

Mr. Roberts, Governor of Cork city jail, has been directed by the Lord Lieutenant to institute proceedings against Canon O'Mahony, in connection with the recent prison scandal. The Rev. gentleman will, in his defense, be able to bring forward such evidence which would be admissible in criminal proceedings.

At a meeting of the Cosgrial National League, on Sunday, Feb. 26th, Canon Keller presiding, resolutions were passed sympathizing with Rev. Father Kennedy, Mullin, who was recently located at that town; and also with the Plan-to-be-treated who were arrested the previous week.

The London Citizen's says that Dr. Tanner is to be next married to Miss Roberts, a rich lady of Cork.

Derry.

The funeral discussion of the late William Mc Keelery, Moneyglen, were celebrated in the Cathedral Derry on Sunday, Feb. 26th.

Donegal.

The sad news that Father McFadden has been sentenced to Parliament for two years, for the crime of "Land Leaguing" has caused a great sensation. The Father's sermons are very 1879 and the consolation of the people. Father McFadden's Mass was one of the most valuable part of the business but it was not to be, and the Father's sermons in the very point where they are at all sensitive.

PRAISE TO ALMIGHTY GOD.

When morning gilds the earth with golden light,
Dispelling for the season of calm night,
Unfolding the dews that glow on flower-gems,
Like diamonds sparkling on earth's diadems;
From mind sweeds the rapture-filling song
Of countless whistling voiceless—a throng
Of sweet-voiced birds, whose soft melodies blend
To praise the more—their pleasure-giving friend.
Thus while full Nature smiles, I hasten away
To where the dulcet dove with sonorous cry,
Burns bright before the tabernacle fair,
Which tells us that our God resides there.
I kneel, and from my heart there gushes forth
This sincere prayer to Jesus, King of Earth:

JESUS, save from Thy bright throne,
Guide Thou my stormy way;
Fixed on with fullness of Thy love,
Thy wishes to obey.

And when the sun hath set in heaven bright,
(His blazing presence stars defies the sight,)
Casts down his rays upon the eager sod,
Which smiles and chants a hymn of thanks to God,
The black and sighing woods which feel his rays,
In doleful numbers echo forth their lays
Of praise. The little streams with cheering voice,
And laughing murmurs sing: Rejoice, rejoice.
Ah! then with joyful feet I wand my way,
While Nature smiles in the glorious face of day,
To praise within the sacrificial altar,
My God—and heartfelt sing this song of prayer:
Root in the Maker of the world,
Who fills all land with love;
Grant me the grace to praise Thee! Mild Angelic choirs above.

With regal step the sun hasten to the West,
To sink upon the ocean's soothing breast;
A tender glow corresponds his mighty mine,
When ocean's broad expanse form is seen.
The bride so longed for gains their mystic song;
The morn'ring streams glide silently along.
New Bloom, language of old chase dread,
Speaks forth each day's last parting glance has fled;
Dull shroud-like darkness from Night's shoon hand,
Falls silently and calmly o'er the land.
Now once again within his chapel dim,
Contritely I raise up my soul to Him.
Oh, God! at morning, noon and night,
Ever guide me on my way;
Oh, fill my faltic mind with light,
Thy wishes to obey.

MY BIRTHDAY.

Swift flew the bright and pleasure-distilled year
On floating orbs of quick-revolving Time,
Borne onward without ambitious of a tear,
To swell the tomb of mighty Past-sublime
Not one I mine with bewildered gaze
The emblem and portals of my new-born year.
With fervent and grateful to God I raise
My feeble voice in prayer and thanks above
Alone thy narrow road that leads to God,
I have been guided by an angel bright,
Whose radiant presence o'er the sinful sod,
Calm sheds a peace and heaven-reflected light
Yet, God, I cannot voice the thoughts that rise
Deep in the chamber of my surging mind;
The emotions prayer that struggle to my breast,
All humbly seek an utterance to find.
Yet, Lord, Thou knowest the glimpse of souls
Thy Spirit, Lord, hallowing, raise,
From divers harms His hand hath shielded me,
From Satan's wiles, from sorrow's withering gaze;
Then this my soul a grateful anthem—
To God, sweet odours of love upraise.
Then may His name be held in reverence dear;
May all men know His depth of boundless love.
And how their souls without the sien of fear
To God the Sovereign Lord who reigneth above.

A TYPE OF THE DIVINITY.

When I would see the Godhead in repose,
I seek some little child
Whose hair like ethic of sunlight brightly glows,
Whose soul is undefiled.

I twine her both arms gently into mine,
And watch her dazzling face;
Her eyes, where a Divinity doth shine,
Her mouth—type of unfathomed grace.

I kiss her cheek and say soon pleasantly,
To have her smile at me. That smile
Is Heaven, when from a cloudless sky
His footsteps sunlight gilds some troyd hill!
But if parchance I wound her gleaming heart,
Chasing her hands to her face, she sighed
I can't do anger is that sweet face start,
And lose her love to smooth it out again.
Oh, God! If ever I have felt Thee near,
And bowed to Thee a contrite penitent!
If ever I have held Thy comfort dear,
And so turned for days forgetful of Thee spent,
Thy wisdom some young child has come to teach Me,
And with its great bliss eyes looked at my face,
Then do I blush before its purity,
And will a sinner's reverence for its grace.
Then do I think of Him that Mary bore,
Of a—one of Perfect manhood to unite one more
In His child's guise to turn my soul to Heaven.

SEDUCTIVE WINE.

Sadly at close the eyes come tapping,
Gently tapping at man's door;
Wooing bright youth with phantasy's promise,
Leaving one with her gifted sore;
Amazes too from her sunlit eyes
Flaste its glamm from Elysian skies.

Odorous breathings soothing sense tire,
Bliss all hearts in a trance of dreams;
Mystical incense wafted and bewitching,
Floateth out from her habit of fray;
Witching eyes that burn the brain,
Cause and incense of shame and pain.

Stretching out arms in wanton coaxing,
Danger lurks in her perfumed breath,
Lungs-eyes eyes are raised in persuasion,
Luring men on to destruction and death;
Binding the soul in her mystic spell,
Changing mortals to foes of hell.

Patient her eyes—her lips—her
Fetters! clown to her will evermore,
Stranded and wrecked alone they are lying
Alcohol by the wave—her shrine—her altar;
Pillow winds are the bleaching shroud
Wrapping form once so beauty and proud.

Outcasts alone in agony dying,
Spurned by her who has wrecked their soul,
Taking their all for amorous shadows,
Luring them on to a pestilence foul;
Dying alone where their bleaching bones
Need no epitaph's glowing tones.

Beautiful temptress! Lackaday man on,
Or, in fell at thy revelling strains,
Where lovers in mad'ning frenzy are thrown!
Heaven away for embrace of thine—
Blindly desiring thy wanton delu,
Ample for the their reluctant.

Literary Miscellany.

Janet's Vision.

A BEAUTIFUL CATHOLIC STORY WRITTEN FOR THE MONITOR BY "MANZANITA."

Two small rooms, the bare walls and floors, unpainted white, and yet giving every furniture of which, gave unmistakable evidence of grim, gaunt poverty. At a plain deal table a woman was sitting in attitude of weariness and despair; her head, resting on her hands, which were clasped on the table before her.

The woman was poorly, but cleanly clad in a neat, well fitting calico dress, which did not hide her slight, graceful figure, greatly at variance with her coarse and common surroundings. As she lifted her head from the table she showed a face of rare sweetness and gentleness, marking its owner as the possessor of a spirit of refinement, purity and goodness. Deep lines were around the sweet, patient-looking mouth; the hair was combed away from the pale, pure forehead on which were also, in delicity printed, the marks of care and sorrow. Clasping her hands to her face, she sighed deeply, then, moving to the next room, a room as poor as its companion, she spoke to a young girl, who was then tending a baby in its cradle, while, near by, was a boy, of three or four summers, playing with his blocks. "Stella," she said, and her voice was low and gentle, a voice well matched to her face, "I am going out for half an hour or so, will you take good care of the children, until my return?" "Indeed ma'm, I will," she replied, "don't be uneasy, it's a fine time we'll have of it together." Donning a shawl and an unpretentious nothing bonnet, Janet Shaw passed out of the house, through the dirty dark alley to the main street, leading to the church of St. Ignatius.

Janet was the only daughter of wealthy people, and from her birth had been surrounded by luxury and plenty, knowing nothing of the work-day world; of a gentle, sensitive nature, loving, tender hearted, with a mind endowed by nature with many a gift, which a fond mother had perfected by every means in her power, she was little fitted to cope with poverty and its many ills. The first few years of her married life were years of prosperity and plenty; then came sickness, followed by losses of one kind and another. Then they moved to San Francisco to better their condition, but alas! to find in a strange country, far from friends, a harder lot; and now starvation seemed staring them in the face. Janet had one consolor, one friend to lean on whenever yet deserted any one in trouble or want—Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament of the Altar. Although a Protestant at her birth, she had early embraced the Catholic faith and had found there in every strengthening grace needed in time of trouble and sorrow. It was but a short walk from her poor home to the church where, many a time she had been for, and found, the comfort and strength she needed.

Entering the church, she knelt down, unmindful of her dress, and, with her head bowed in humble and fervent prayer, she poured out her soul to God, her Father, who, knowing her need, had ordained the Sacrament of the Altar. Entering the church, she knelt down, unmindful of her dress, and, with her head bowed in humble and fervent prayer, she poured out her soul to God, her Father, who, knowing her need, had ordained the Sacrament of the Altar. Thus it was which stopped her at the gates of heaven and caused this great agony of anguish in her soul. She knew that God knows itself, or in eternity of joy could efface from her soul the bitterness of that moment. 'Again she saw herself at the entrance of this beautiful field, and Jesus on the other hand. He looked at her with unutterable love, and, bending towards her, took her by the hand drawing her to Him, and with unspeakable endearment kept her at His side. The vision passed. When Janet remembered the pain and anguish she had felt at the gates of heaven after passing the years of her life in pleasure and enjoyment, she fell on her knees and, with tears, thanked God from her heart for every joy she had lost, for every pain and sorrow she had to bear; well she knew then that no sorrow could equal the pain she had experienced in her vision.

Janet left the church comforted and strengthened by the light of grace in her soul, which illuminated with faith and hope and strengthened with patience and resignation. In the years that came and passed, Janet, in her hours of greatest trial, would close her eyes and see Jesus, weary and worn, travel stained and foot-sore, clasping her by the hand, tenderly wending His way along the dark and lonely road, and, in spirit, bending over His hand, which love prompted to her own, she would cover it with her tears and kisses, and thank Him again and again for the love that bore with her, and saved her from the agony in store at the last. For her soul, loving Jesus, glorified in sharing with Him His pain and sorrow.

Oh! ye hearts bowed down with your weight of care, Oh ye souls crushed with your load of sorrow! take heart and be comforted. Every sorrow will be a crown of glory, every pain a jewel in that crown. Crown and jewels without price.

And let it be written in letters of fire on your and those souls "God is love." "God is love."

In your hours of trouble and sorrow, when your heart is hot and rebellious, and the waves of temptation roll over your soul, and darkness and despair reign within you—go and kneel before the Blessed Sacrament. You have no need of our words. Jesus knows, He will say "Peace, be still," and the troubled spirit of your being will obey that voice as did the waves and winds of the Lake of Gennesareth.

SECTARIAN SEGREGATION.

A Protestant Paper Jeers at the Brethren.

The Chicago Living Church, which is the organ of the High Church faction in the Episcopal sect, in a recent issue says

A Chicago woman, residing in the city of Guatemala, C. A., gives The Church Advocate an interesting illustration of Christian unity and its inspiring effect on missionary work. The city has an English speaking population—Protestant, of course—of about 200 in a total of some 45,000, the rest being all of a shady Romanism. The Protestant population has been the sole resource of Leo XIII.

Modification of Rate by Emigration.

Americans desired from English parents, and without association with any other nationality are not English. Their mental character and physique have changed, to have their accent and language. The Mexicans in Texas, the Spaniards in Mexico, Canadians, Australians and New Zealanders take on a distinctive character of their own, under a changed climate. The Pennsylvania Dutch have lost their likeness to Hessians, as the Boers have lost their to a great extent to the Hollanders. Abundance of examples also show that on every side, as in our own, when an immigrant colony does not mix with other elements. Even the Jews must submit to the modifying law of country, and climate, and time. Old colonies in Canada, Nova Scotia and Algiers have little likeness to the Jews of England and Germany. Italians by thousands are pouring into South America, but a century hence they will have a feature and language little resemblance to the Italians of Italy. These new nations are constantly being born, unlike any others that have existed. There never before was a nation like this in habit of thought, physical or mental traits. The German Americans must become something better than they are, or they will be swamped—possibly better than the people among whom they settled a long, but different, certainly. No one is wise enough to predict the character of the nationality who will inhabit the continent two centuries hence. They may be probably will be, such as will look, back upon this age as we look back upon the Middle Ages, or think of the people of the Nineteenth Century as we think of those of the days of Alfred the Great.

Rev. Hector Sinclair, of Providence, R. I., Cathedral, has announced that hereafter no pews will be rented in that church, and neither will opening of office be permitted.

A STUPENDOUS MIRACLE.

What an American Priest Saw in France.

The following extract is from a letter of Father Sheehan, now sojourning in France, to the Catholic Columbian.

We went to Arles sur-Tech which appears to be a few days ago, to visit the shrine of a living miracle. Over the door of the very old church of St. Andrew and Saviour are carved in bas-relief, two figures of angels surrounding another, which seems to grow out of and from their shoulders as wings. They are there in remembrance of the time when mountains were devoured the flocks and children of the people of the ancient and sleepy town. The Benedictine Abbot, Amalé, beloved of his people, went to Rome in 1882, to bring from there the relics of SS. Abdon and Sennen, Persian martyrs buried under Decius. These relics were put in the shrine of a cross composed of gems into which a stone coffin was laterally divided, and the upper and lower tiers filled with water, so that the relics might be safe from the depredations of robbers or the importunities of the pious during their trip all from the Eternal City to Arles. Some time the coffin has never ceased to give an unfailing supply of pure water, though no one has been allowed to put it from the outside I saw it myself. The lid is a real shaped, hinged down with iron, and the whole cut in unapproached stone blocks that have no further connection with it. The supply of water taken therefrom on the Feast day of the Saints far exceeded, days and even, the quantity it could naturally contain. This has been officially examined and confirmed by several—the Bishop, who is that the miracle is authoritatively authenticated. I received a bottle of the wonderful water, and I think Father Cleary is writing an account of it. Many people have left crutches in the grounds of the chapel, and a great deal of our visit and journey of the miracle.

Over a door of one of the very old houses in here I saw the following inscription a day or two ago, and it struck me as being a text coming to the belief of the people in the village at an early date in what has since become a cradle of our Church

"CAST MARIA SIN PECADO CONCEBIDA, 1604."

Still with all that, the religious aspect of France appears black indeed. The social aspect apparently is its opposite. On Sundays the people have work and yet in that they do many other days in the week. They did the same in Paris, Toulouse, Perpignan, and in other places where I have passed the day or two. At least I can say, with a world very hard to discern any difference between the business transacted in town and country on Sunday or on Monday.

My doctor here, on being introduced to him, said he could hardly ever see an Irish man without wishing at the same time that he could shake the English Government. He said the French have a grateful position, from all the sympathy extended to them in Ireland during the period of their bitter struggles in 1870. These sentiments of his were moreover, in the strongest terms, and, of course I must hold his profession, opinion of the highest possible authority. He has his problem no more to do any more, or lend money to French and Spanish, but he is one of those peculiar warm natural waters, and is a Catholic Irishman, and, I think, loved by the latter means he hopes to remove from my lungs the remnants of former attacks of bronchitis, which I do think I will have to endure years there consumably during my life, if I remain, but if I go to Italy, or a milder climate, amid the interesting memories clinging to the old villages around Evidences of His Existence in California.

In Tuolumne county from 1862 to 1865, stone mortars and platters were found in the hydraulic mines, along with the bones and teeth of a mastodon, 90 feet below the surface, and a stone pestle was found in a tunnel driven under Table Mountain. In 1870, a stone mortar was struck at a depth of 150 feet, in gravel under Sonora, as the hand of the very old church of SS. IRELAND'S OLDEST BISHOP.

Dr Walsh, Based at 84 Years.

Already the Bishop of Ireland has begun to kindle warmer and brighter, and has turned in those windows. We appreciate the Bishop of Ireland, Dr. Walsh, of Dublin, Waterford.

The venerable departed prelate had reached the great age of 84 years. He was born in Ireland, in the year 1804, and was a boy in France. He was seven years in that country, and was ordained a priest, and he was seven years more a priest in France, and was Bishop. A native of New Ross, he received his early education at the Christian Brothers' School, and afterwards at the Classical school at that place nearly eighty years ago. He was ordained priest, and, the medical profession, but only such as showing a great aptitude for the study of the Fathers, Professor Wesford, whose he was a student, and the Jesuits College of SS. Patrick, at Clonliffe. He was ordained priest in 1840, and was appointed a priest of the mission at intervals, and of his labors as a priest were collegiate. In Carlow 1851 he was appointed President of Maynooth, and was appointed President of Maynooth, and was appointed President of Maynooth, and

EDITORIAL NOTES.

— Recently, at the Seminary Mt. St. Mary's of the West, Cincinnati, O., the Very Rev. Thos. S. Byrne, rector, received the degree of Doctor of Theology. The degree was granted by the Pope in recognition of the past great services rendered by Dr. Byrne to the cause of ecclesiastical science in the Archdiocese of Cincinnati. Archbishop Elder officiated.

— The London Truth says the Vatican has received an addition to its works of art, in the shape of a huge bas-relief, representing Prince Bismarck, receiving, in a very obsequious attitude, the Pope's award on the subject of the Caroline Islands. It is the work of a devout Roman artist; and is intended as a companion to the famous relief in St. Peter's, which depicts the Emperor Henry's submission at Canossa.

— The latest departure from Christian law and common decency which Protestantism is accountable for, is the marriage of an uncle to his niece. This horrible union was consecrated last month in New York by Rev. Dr. McArthur of Calvary Baptist Church, who found nothing in secular law or in the canons of any Protestant sect to forbid such a republican alliance, Such is the downward course of Protestant "progress" in this remarkably "enlightened" century and country!

— The monument of the Irish brigade, on the battlefield of Gettysburg, will be unveiled July 2, on the position occupied by the brigade on July 2, 1863. It is proposed to invite every veteran of the brigade to be present and also their friends and the sanitarians to the monumental fund. The unveiling will be attended with appropriate ceremony. The music will be the same as after the battle of Solferino, and will be rendered by a large chorus with the accompaniment of a military band.

— Mr. Maurice F. Egan and Mr. John A. McMaster have now become joint owners of the New York Freeman's Journal. Mr. Egan was for many years the valued editorial associate of the late James McMaster, and now, as editor-in-chief and acquiring one-half proprietorship, is, as Mr. John D. Kisly, Jr., administrator of the McMaster estate, expresses it, but consummating the plans which his late honored chief so earnestly cherished. The Monitor sends its best wishes for the literary and financial success of the new firm.

— Says the Milwaukee Catholic Citizen: It will be particularly interesting to American Catholics to know that the sermon which justified the canonization of St. Peter Claver were wrought in the United States, and were investigated by the Metropolitan of Milwaukee, Philadelphia, and St. Louis which was performed on a Catholic lady of this city about twenty years ago! by the application of the relics of St. Peter Claver by the hands of Father X. Weninger, S. J., the illustrious missionary, who himself imitated the devotion of Peter Claver to the negro race.

—The Churchman's charges against the Church of Christ, which is wholly holy and infallible, yet polluted by sectarian erudition, are condemned by the very fact that they are the concections of a crooked-minded parson whose falsifying character is at present being thoroughly ventilated in these columns. When the Churchman can retract any respectable sonnet from whence to draw its inspiration in its efforts at convicting the Church of "crookedness" in faith or morals, we will give its nasticuss due consideration. But when it could Little dale's tin-pan thumping, and tries to pass off such flagrant falsehoods for its own home-made thunder—we will treat all such scheming with the silent scorn it deserves.

— The recent snow storm in New York occasioned many strange incidents. Here is one as related by the Sun of that city:—

"The great snowstorm on Monday shut in a family on Atlantic Avenue, Brooklyn, so completely that ingress and egress were impossible. The head of the household was in a distant city, and the provisions became exhausted. A Shanghai rooster was taken from his perch in the cellar and boiled in the dinner pot. Still the family were hungry. On Tuesday morning seven English sparrows, baffled by the storm, had spent a snow-drift in front of the parlor windows and died. These were secured with the help of a poker and fried in butter. Although the sparrows proved to be delicious eating, they were wholly inadequate to stay the gnawing hunger. Later in the day the neighbors tunnelled a passage to the basement door, and the family were enabled to get a square meal in the grocery near by."

— A very edifying exhibition of Catholic charity transpired in Washington City on the feast of St. Joseph when the patrons of the Home for the aged men and women under charge of the Little Sisters of the Poor prepared a special dinner for their wards and waited upon the table themselves. The 200 old people sat down to the sumptuous repast, whilst Minister Roustan, of the French legation, and many people in high life, did the honors on the occasion by acting as waiters. There were a score or more of old "aunties" and "uncles" also attended to by the distinguished guests. This custom of thus waiting upon the old people on St. Joseph's Day comes with the customs of the Little Sisters Order from France. Among those present, and who acted as waiters, were Mme. Bonaparte, Miss Jamie Biggs, Mrs. Admiral Franklin, Mrs. E. Phillips, Miss Hettie F. Loring, Miss Hodgson, Miss Dangerfield, Mrs. Senator Stanford, the French Minister and M. Bourcy (of the French Legation). All Catholic Catholics will feel a laudable pride in seeing the name of Mrs. Stanford associated in such a beautiful work of real Catholic charity.

An Objection Answered.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 26th, 1888.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:

Dear Sir—It is your habit a page or more back to quote Scripture and then say something over even though it would "empty hell and fill heaven." I would like to see you reconcile your belief with the passage of Scripture wherein it appears that God rewarded the midwives for telling a lie to save the children (the new born) from the wrath of the wicked king.

C. L.

The scriptural texts of Exodus, chapter 1, verses 16 to 22, do not militate in the least against our statement, that it is unlawful to tell a lie, even if by telling it we should "empty hell and fill heaven," for Almighty God rewarded the Egyptian midwives, not because they told a lie to King Pharao, but because they shrank from executing his barbarous and inhuman order to kill at birth all the male children of the Hebrews. This fact is distinctly stated in verse 21 where we read: "Because the midwives feared God, He built them houses."

We are sure that many of our readers—and more particularly our critical correspondent—will be not a little surprised to learn that the objection here referred to is rather antiquated, as it was proposed as early as at the time of St. Augustine, in the fourth century of the Christian era, and was completely answered by that great Doctor of the Church in one of his books entitled, Contra Mendacium—"Against Lying." We quote from his work, volume 40 of the Migne edition of the Latin Fathers, Paris, 1861, chapter xv., paragraphs 31-2:

ORIGINAL TEXT—Premisam dictam ut a Deo mentiendo sint gesta mentiri ceset, sed quia in feminas Deo misericordia fuerunt, non est inique in ea remuneratio fallacia, sed beneficiatio, benignus enim mendax, non malignus mendacium; et propterea illed bonum Deus etiam hæc mala gessit.

TRANSLATION—God rewarded the midwives not because they lied (to Pharaoh) but because they were merciful to the people of God; there is not their deception that was recompensed, but their benevolence; the goodness of their falsehood, and not the site of their lie and so much of the good that they did, God also purposed them the evil they committed."

Such evidence from such a great Bishop and Doctor of the Church, must clearly demonstrate to "C. L." that the Monitor was well within the line of scriptural authority and Christian teaching when it declared that it would "empty hell and fill heaven."

The "Call" on Easter.

Yesterday Christendom commemorated with joyful celebration and words of thanksgiving and praise the triumphal resurrection of Christ from the dead. As commemorative the custom of Christian religion Easter has always been regarded as the chief festival of the Christian year, and has been from the earliest times observed with ritualistic and elaborate ceremonies. Still there is no trace of the celebration of Easter as a Christian festival in the New Testament or in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers.—The Call of Monday last.

All Christendom, says the Call, commemorates a Christian festival of which no trace is to be found in the New Testament or in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers. Now if the Call is right in its dogmatic decision that the Christian festival of which no trace is to be found in the New Testament or in the writings of the Apostolic Fathers, is an "empty shell" and "a lie" then the Christian world—The Protestant world—is wrong—state of affairs not very likely to exist—by any stretch of the imagination—in the Christian world. The New Testament speaks of the Passover and the Jewish festival of which Easter is the Christian type. The Bible—our Divine Lord—the true Paschal Lamb, and—the fact to the contrary notwithstanding—the festival of Easter goes back to the early centuries of Christianity. St. Polycarp was a disciple of St. John the Baptist (who was assuredly one of the "Apostolic Fathers" alluded to by Call) journeyed to Rome about the year 160 in order to receive instructions from the successor of St. Peter as to the proper time for celebrating Easter, there being a diversity of opinion among the Christians of the first ages as to this proper day for celebrating the festival. Here, therefore, we find both the New Testament and the Apostolic Fathers on the side of "all Christendom," while the critical Call stands solitary and alone, developed in the fog of its own error. If the Call would adopt the motto of Dary Cracker: "Be sure you're right, then go ahead," it would leave unassailed many of its dogmatic decisions concerning Catholic matters which are misleading to many Christians and supremely ridiculous even only by Catholics who know more than the Call does about "all Christendom" and also the "Apostolic Fathers."

— Archbishop Ryan of Philadelphia, the "Chrysostom of America," on Monday last in course preached in Rome, gave the following practical illustration of Christian revenge. He said: "A French family during the awful negro insurrection in San Domingo, had been almost exterminated, the sole survivor, a young boy, had seen all his kindred, father, mother, sister and brothers, brutally butchered, and with every aggravation of cruelty and outrage. When the boy grew to manhood he meditated a Christian revenge on the whole negro race. He became a priest, and then, mindful of his sister's fate, he gave his whole fortune to found a convent home in Maryland for negro girls, and he himself became its chaplain."

— It can be stated upon absolute and direct authority that, providing his health will permit, Hon. William E. Gladstone will pay a visit to the United States next fall. He will be accompanied by his son Herbert, and Sir Lyon Playfair, but it is hardly probably that Mrs. Gladstone, who holds sea voyages in mortal horror, will be induced to form one of the party. The visit will be entirely a private one, and the ex-Premier's physicians, two of whom according to the present plans will accompany him, will see to it that all invitations to banquets, formal receptions, etc., will be declined on the plea of advanced age and the necessity for an utter avoidance of excitement.

— Dr. Windthorst has laid before the Prussian Landtag the draft of an educational law which secures for elementary schools the direction of the ecclesiastical authorities in religious matters. The first paragraph of the measure claims for the ecclesiastical powers the right to rule, for ecclesiastical and religious reasons, the nomination of teachers; and the second places in the hands the sole care of choosing the medium by which religious education is given in the schools.

E. Dwyer Gray Dead.

A cablegram from Dublin last week brought the sad news that E. Dwyer Gray, M. P., the distinguished editor of the Dublin Freeman's Journal died in that city on last Wednesday.

In the death of this eminent literary light of Erin, Ireland loses a self-sacrificing patriot and Parnell still mourns one of his most faithful coworkers in the cause of Ireland's freedom.

Mr. Gray was the son of the late Sir John Gray, who stands in the front rank of the phalanx of literary men who have given their talents towards the vindication of their country. Young Gray learned early in life the history of Ireland's wrongs from his father, hence when he entered upon the threshold of manhood he at once plunged into politics, entering the ranks of the Tenant Right party under the guidance of Isaac Butt.

When the Tenant Right agitation went down Mr. Gray gave his fealty in 1877 to Messrs. Parnell and Biggar, when these coworkers for Ireland's cause tried to gather about them the scattered remnants of Irish patriotism which then sepirely lingered around the shrine of Erin's slavery and starvation.

In 1880 Mr. Gray was elected Lord Mayor of Dublin, and the great interest he manifested in relieving the cruelful sufferers of that year of Irish famine, gained for him the undying love and gratitude of the Irish people in every clime.

Mr. Gray was born in Dublin in 1846, and was consequently in the 42nd year of his age when death cut off a career that promised great benefit to the forces on the battle-field of Irish freedom. He represented the county Carlow in the British Parliament, but his literary duties confined his labors to the production of his pen than the advocacy of Ireland's rights before an assemblage of men among whom were to be found some of Erin's most vindictive enemies. His remains repose in Glasnevin graveyard adjacent to the shrines wherein rest the ashes of many a true and tried Irish patriot who has fought the good fight for Ireland's faith and the freedom of her Parliament.

— The autograph letter from the Pope to Emperor Frederick, which Mgr. Galimberti taken to Berlin, expresses the deep sorrow of his Holiness at the death of a monarch who was animated by the friendliest feelings towards the Catholic Church. The Pope thanks Emperor Frederick for the kind proclamation, which, he says, gives him joy, inasmuch as it proves that the son shrinks the sentiments of his father—sentiments which give assurance that the relations between Prussia and the Vatican shall become more and more friendly. The Pope on his part will do all in his power to conserve a friendship that will be to the glory of both the Emperor and the Papacy. In conclusion his Holiness expresses a hope that the Emperor may recover his full health, in the interests alike of his people and of the whole of Europe.

— For the past fifty years or more Ireland has lost annually about forty thousand souls by more than the inexplicable character of her most defenses. But now the case stands differently. Other powers in Europe have built ships of war to be always equal to those of England in size and offensive strength, so that in the event of a general war England and Ireland are so easy as it used to be for England to prevent the landing of a big army on her soil. Attention to the altered state of things is directed by Mr. Stephen Spoerry, Secretary for War, who urges immediate measures for strengthening the land defenses at Plymouth, Portsmouth and the mouth of the Thames. The suggestions of Contment is not so peaced that England feels a little uneasy.

— Mr. Peter Donahoe, of this city, is one of the Pontifical Cameriere Segreti of his Holiness. On the 25th instant, being month, Mr. Donahoe, who was accompanying the Pontiff to and from the audience, was accosted on the road by a Protestant in a jubilee memorial, his white zucchetto, or skull cap. The Pope said: "Take it, take it" and taken from his head, Alfio Mr. Donahoe gently removed the cap therefrom. It is perhaps, the first occasion on which the present Pope has granted such a request and, strange to say, the gracious concession was made to an American. It is unnecessary to add that Mr. Donahoe regards this white zucchetto almost as a relic.

—The peculiar result that seems to follow from "getting religion" according to the Methodist prescription, is to turn the victims of emotional religion into lunatics. A few weeks ago while Rev. H. Y. Yatman was holding service in the Franklin Street M. E. Church, at Wilkesbarre, Pa., Leonard Johnson jumped out of his seat and cried out at the top of his voice: "Don't say another word now, I am saved! I see the Lord! Let me do the preaching." Johnson made a rush for the pulpit. Becoming very desperate, he threatened to stab those who surrounded him if they did not let him take possession of the pulpit. He was finally overpowered, and four policemen took him to the lock up. The man is now a raving maniac. There are thousands of similar cases now on record, all of which tend to show the evils which follow from religious error and its baneful influence upon the human mind.

—England's two foremost men in religion and politics are at present writing for the American reading public two important articles dealing with questions of paramount interest. Cardinal Manning is preparing a paper for the next number of the American Catholic Quarterly Review on social and political questions, based on the teachings of St. Thomas Aquinas and St. Alphonsus Ligouri regarding the rights of the starving poor; and Mr. Gladstone is engaged upon an essay, for the North American Review, dealing with Ingersoll's views on religion.

—It is reported in Rome that the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda has written a letter to Bishop Vaughan, of Salford, priest-of the London Tablet, requiring him to moderate the language of that journal which, in its anti-Irish expressions, has outraged Christian decency.

CONTROVERTED POINTS ON CATHOLIC MATTERS.

5.—The Suppression of the Society of Jesus by Clement XIV.—An Examination of Dr. Littledale's Version and Perversion of some Historical Facts connected with that Event.

We have hitherto been forced to say, but always with proof on hand, some hard things respecting the character of our Ritualistic opponents, and we are now compelled once more either to himself or to those, whose cause he represents, and upon it are for the last time we refrain from using such epithets as readers with a further exposure of his libelous predictions, we might yet tell a good deal more. Only a few days ago we received from a friend a valuable document relative to the present question in the shape of some very damaging testimony relative against Littledale's fairness and veracity; a testimony, mind well, brought forward and duly proved not by Catholic writers like ourselves, living thousands of miles away from the scene of the Doctor's pastoral zeal in the interests of truth, but, strange to say, by his own brother parsons of the Protestant fraternity, who, be it said to their honor, indignantly reject all sympathy with his views, and have particularly with the weapons, with which he strives to sustain them. To corroborate our own statements by the assertions of witnesses, that cannot for a moment be suspected of partiality on behalf of Catholics, and by way of conclusion of the present controversy regarding, we intend to publish a setting close to our neat article some extracts from the documents here referred to. However, before proceeding to do so, we feel we are entitled to think that the case has now been sufficiently cleared up and the evidence in our favor, so that, we may, at least from each, we might therefore afford to dismiss it from court with the verdict of guilty against the defendant, if wrong by silence to make in this instance a little change from the usual technical wording of the court. But we must before hand redeem the promise, that we made at the conclusion of our preceding number, and take the Rev. Doctor one more to task for his version, or rather perversion of several historical facts connected with the suppression and sum with the restoration of the hated and much maligned Society of Jesus.

Limiting ourselves at present to the first of these events as a modern writer in the Month, an English Review, well remarks, it is a well-known fact that everywhere that the Jesuits have sanctify founder, Ignatius of Loyola, prayed to God, that the Society, which he had been instrumental in establishing, might always be persecuted, and thus, like the agitated waters of the sea, be constantly kept free from all corruption, it has been the fashion all the world over to hold the Jesuit up from time to time to ridicule and hatred. Near leading in no longer in vogue, but the Jesuit is still fair game and good sport, as ready a scarecrow for all evil minded people to frighten the timid Pawkies as an established mark for little boys to pelt with apples and crackers in the streets of London on the 5th of November. The Jesuit has for friends comparatively fewer still to put in a kind word for him. Hate a Jew, and all the world cries out against the Jew, and none but a few chuckle and applaud. Our Blessed Lord's prediction that His disciples should be hold in hatred for His Name's sake has been fulfilled to the letter in the case of the Jesuit. He bears by the Divine Bounty the Sacred Name and thus takes the consequence of an honor at once so great and always so merited by any of Christ's followers. Suffering has, in consequence, been the lot of all who tribe from the first moment of its existence. The persistent persecution, which the Lord for reason worthy of His Infinite Wisdom has thought proper to allow trial and test of the fidelity of His servants, prove how literally the prayer of their Founder was heard.

The Jesuits has been from time immemorial hunted down and worried. Things have at times gone so far that it seemed to be no violation of the law of God, no infringement of justice, no breach of charity to misrepresent, rifle, blacken and slander them. In the opinion of the world general enemies the Jesuit has no character to lose, and no feelings to hurt. He is considered fair game. He is a mere lawless rebel. To harry such a being on to destruction is to do good service to God and man. It is interesting to know that the existence and doings of such characters, as are many of the enemies of the Jesuits and of the Church, have been clearly foretold by our Blessed Saviour in His Gospel, when He said, as we read in St. John chap. xvi, verse 2: "Yes, the hour cometh, that whosoever killeth you, will think that he doth a service to God." Though the His formers have not been alone in this ignominious warfare, for the infidels and apostate Catholics have frequently joined hands with them and fought under the same banner, yet history proves that the adversaries and victims of the heroics that the Society was providentially organized to combat, have generally held a conspicuous place in the ranks of the adversaries of the Jesuits, with some exceptions highly honorable to the individuals that constitute them. Hence from the days in which Malachias conjured the princes of Europe to take up arms for the extermination of the Society of Jesus; from the days when Clement XIV. wrote to Ilesa: "As to the Jesuits, we must murder them, and if that cannot be ceremonious; by-done, we should at all events overwhelm them with calumnies and lies," from those days, we say, even to the infidel age, which ushered Voltaire's shrieks of rage and hate, the Order founded by the tears here of Loyola, publicly commented by the Clement of Trent as a "pious institution," approved by twenty Popes, and protected, blessed and employed by innumerable Bishops throughout the Catholic world, has been familiar with persecution in every shape and form. But when it was discovered that open violence was powerless against men who bade defiance to the tyranny of the persecutors of the Faith of Christ; men who counted death of the hands of the heathen in India, China and Japan, who stood to be hacked to pieces and flayed and burned alive by the savages of North America, and when this scarcely less savage penal laws of England never once deterred from making their way into that heretical country thirsting for their blood, then the enemies of the Society had recourse to other and, if possible, more diabolical means, for a time at least, totally prevailed; we mean the customary weapons of cowards, the vile, slander, misrepresentation and calumny. We allude, of course, to the contemporary overthrow of the Society, the result of a vast combination of that rationalistic spirit of the Jesuits, which has at last succeeded in the Protestant Pseudo-Christian Prime Ministers of the Bourbon Kings, that one and all were clamoring for the suppression of the Jesuits, as a kind of justification in the eyes of the world, or at least of many easily deceived, of the cruel persecution, which they were about to inflict on both openly and secretly against the hated and doomed Society.

To prove that Clement XIV. pronounced no definite judgment as to the charges alleged in the Brief, but only related history only the accusations against the Society of Jesus put forward by their opponents, and particularly through the representatives of the Bourbon dynasties, we here quote an extract from a letter addressed by the same Pound to Louis XV. if time only allowed time before the publication of the Brief of Suppression: "I can neither excuse nor abolish an Institute which has been commended by nineteen of my predecessors, and which, for ever, must have been confirmed by the Council of Trent, if, according to your French maxims, the General Council is above the Pope." [We here observe parenthetically that in the above passage the Pontiff alludes to the Gallican erroneous opinion of the supremacy of Council over the Pope—a doctrine which has been totally condemned as heretical by the Vatican Council, 1870.] And he continues: "Some have put forth charges against these charges, he tells us on page 199, "it has been necessary to cite these books of the Brief, because the apologists of the Society allege that no notice sufficiently the Pope saw the desire of peace at any price, and that he did not believe in the culpability of the Fathers. The accusations charges made in this document, and that in the most silent fashion, rebut this plea.

The Jesuits, then, according to Littledale, were pounded as criminals. To be here repeats the accusations of guilt, we shall have to endure two again with the reply drawn from the Pontiff himself, and on this page we had distinctly told the reader that we, in consequence, that the Jesuits were not, after all, so very, very, very, very of consolidate, as some people imagine them.

Then with back respect for the eternal verities of Christianity, we must say that the principal points of their lives are those which they have so strongly and boldly asserted, that the Society of Jesus was suppressed by the Pope, and that the Society is dissatisfied with the suppressed and contradictory to what which he has stated in the Brief. We will say, in a course of all this plain language, have told a little history to after We have assumed

Farm and Home.

Small Farms.

The San Luis Obispo Tribune has the following: "Wonderful transformations are taking place all along the line of the Pacific Coast Railway, from San Luis Obispo to the foot of the Santa Barbara range of mountains in Santa Barbara county. Great ranches have lately changed hands, and the new owners are displaying the right spirit and conforming to the demands of the age by subdividing the land into farms of ten acres or upwards, as may be desired by the home-seeker. Among other beautiful and productive tracts of land now being cut up and placed upon the market are the well-known College and Buell ranches containing over 40,000 acres. This immense body of land was lately purchased by the Santa Ynez Land and Improvement Company, said company being composed of E. W. Steele, ex-Attorney General Wiley and others representing large capital—and all these gentlemen are enthusiastic over their ventures and the future of that portion of the State. Preparations are now being made for planting the olive extensively, and soon, with the olive trees now in their vicinity, of which there are now over 100,000, the College and Buell tracts will become the most extensive olive raising portion of the State. The soil is finely adapted for this industry, as well as for wheat and various fruits and vegetables. The water is excellent and abundant, large tracts can, if necessary be irrigated, and in all respects this new country, through all of which the railroad runs, is one of the most desirable to be found on the Pacific Coast. The principal land is so low as to be within the reach of men of limited means, and the facilities for reaching the great markets of the State insure a grand living for the purchaser of small holdings, if from the first year of his ownership, he will raise vegetables, small fruits, poultry, etc. In the mean time his vineyard or olive orchard arrives at full bearing age, and lands for which he now pays thirty or forty dollars an acre will, in four or five years, readily command from three to seven hundred dollars an acre."

The Largest Flower.

The largest flower that grows is the Rafflesia Arnoldi, measuring as it does a roundish leaves of petals, each a foot in width, of a brick red colour and covered with numerous irregular yellowish white swellings. The petals surround a large cup nearly a foot in diameter, the margin of the cup bears the stamens, and is filled with a leafy disc, the upper surface of which is every where covered with curved projections like miniature cow's horns. The cup when freed from its contents would hold about twelve pints of water. The weight of the entire flower weighs fifteen pounds. It is very solid; the pistil being about as much in thickness. The odour is exactly that of tainted beef, and it is supposed that even flies which always swarm over the flower are deceived by the small end deposit their eggs in the thick disc, taking it for a piece of carrion. The buds push through the hard bark like knobs, continuing to grow until they have the aspect of large coarse cabbages, and in about three months after their first appearance expand into flowers. These remain but a short time in perfection, soon beginning to rot, and leaving only the central disc, which becomes a large round fruit, filled with a number of small simple seeds. The Rafflesia Arnoldi, which is a member of the parasitic family, has no leaves of any kind, but the flowers spring from a small creeping stem about as thick as two fingers. This giant flower is named after Sir Stamford Raffles and Dr. Arnoldi, who discovered it while exploring in the island of Sumatra.

A New Treatment for Boils and Carbuncles.

In a communication to the French Academy of Medicine, at a recent meeting, M. Verneuil says:

The important applications (prominent among which stand the carbolised and boiled solutions) employed in a certain way, and particularly in the form of poultices used repeatedly and for a long time, are of remarkable efficacy, and of the same time are absolutely harmless and easy of application.

These applications of powder quickly short, with very few exceptions, boils and carbuncles. They arrest the progress of the disease in the gravest cases, ordinarily assuage the pains in quickly cease, reduce the fever, diminish the pulsations and suppress nervous tetanus, hasten resolution, and promote the formation of healthy granulations.

This treatment is suitable for all regions, and for all forms and periods of the disease. It is never harmful, and leads to a cure in a large number of cases. It assists surgical interference when that is necessary.

Finally, it tends to prevent auto inoculation and general infection.

California a World within Itself.

California is a world within itself. With labor and business enough, if properly utilized, for the entire population of the United States; with a capacity to feed them, and gold and silver enough to pay them; with land well watered and timbered, and a soil that produces a greater variety of vegetables and fruits than that of any similar area on the face of the earth; with scenery the equal of which cannot be found elsewhere in the world, and a climate which for healthfulness is unequalled. California is truly a world within itself, and I might say a paradise.

The Chances of Life.

Out of every thousand men twenty-five die annually.

One half of those who are born die before they attain the age of seven.

The men able to bear arms form a fourth of the inhabitants of a country.

More old men are found in elevated situations than in valleys or plains.

The number of inhabitants of a city or country is renewed every thirty years.

The proportion between the deaths of women and those of men is 100 to 108.

The probable duration of female life is sixty; but after that period the calculation is more favorable to them than men.

Our Olives and Wines.

What California may do with two of her products, olives and wines, is outlined by the crop reports of Corfu, Greece. This little island, with a population of 20,000, will produce this season an olive crop worth $600,000; while the wine crop of the season is estimated at $400,000. This is only a strip which shows the way the wind blows; but without much precedents, the future great resources of fruit production and wine industry of California are as assured as the rising and setting of the sun.

Home Life.

It has been well said that a single bitter word may dissolve an entire family for a whole day. No matter how humble the whole, if it be garnished with grace and sweetened with kindness and smiles, the heart will turn longingly toward it from all the tumults of the world, and home, if it be ever so homely, will be the dearest spot beneath the shroud of the sun.

Brother Gardner on Cremation.

"Dis letter which I hold in my hand," said brother Gardner, as the notes of the triangle died away, "comes all the way from Virginny, an' it seems to know whether the Lowe Nikin Club farmers cremeshun or burial for de dead, I should like to hear de opinyun of various members.

The Rev. Peasnick ought to be favored bu rials and he looked on the men who didn't as a heathen.

Elder Toots had not had time to make up his mind. He had turned four wires without knowing whether it was easier to cremate than to bury, but should post himself before barging four more.

Parkles Smith wanted to be buried under a persimmon tree when he died, and if dis wish was not carried out some one would be haunted.

Rise Up Johnson had been cold all his life, owing to the high price of fuel, and the idea of warming him up after death was rather pleasant. He had often thought Hades must be a nice place, owing to the good fire always maintained in the stove.

Sir Isaac Walpole had had his ancestors in his old age. One of them was to keep green the last resting place of the wife who had gone hand and hand with him for nearly half a century before being called to the other shore.

Samuel Shine had formed no opinion. All he knew was that turnips were ten cents a bushel higher than last winter, and he starved to death before Spring he did not care whether they burned, buried or used his body as a fricking pan.

Giveadam Jones felt that he was a wicked man, and made no pretense to sentimentality, but he never consigned the body of one of his friends to the flames he hoped to be spared by a bolt of lightning, or a lump pose.

Several other members followed, generally leaning towards the burial of the dead, and the President lifted up his voice "Gen'ul in ar' evidence dat dis club am opposed to cremeshun, so dey letter will be entered to dat effect. Wha all sot he where, condemn cremeshun. It saves buyin' lots o de graveyard, drowsing evil oakets and miasmiss, an if de corner gets de idea dat anything is wrong an wants to dig up de body an' hold on request dat sich am de body in dispute.

The Boy and the Bath Tub.

The wife of a Western Congressman, quite well known in the House, has a delicate apartment said in the dining room—she has three rooms in all—in a curious looking setter, or sofa, which has often attracted the attention of her sisters who looks like a large box all covered with imitation leather cloth. It has figures and plenty of gold thread through it, while the top is tufted, and makes a rather soft seat.

She had some guests in to tea the other evening, and one of them remained later than the others. The guest was seated on the sofa, sipping a glass of wine, talking to the Congressman and his wife, when the door suddenly opened and an apparition appeared on the threshold. It was the 3 year-old son of the member from the West. The boy was arrayed in his night clothes, and carried over one arm a rough bath towel, while under the other he had nearly half a cake of soap, and the other grabbed the knob of the door. His mother gave an exclamation of surprise when she beheld him, but before she could say anything the infant terrible shouted out: "I say, Mr. Jones, I wonder if you'd mind my staying much longer are you going to stay? I have been waiting here for the last hour for you to go home, so I can take my bath. Do you know that you are sitting on the bath tub, and I cannot get in till you go home?"

The scene that followed can be imagined. The gentleman soon after left. The boy being in a very convenient costume, had a sound spanking, while his mother lifted the top of the curious looking sofa, and displayed beside the nice lined bath tub, sponge and all complete. The guest gave the joke away, and now the member asserts that the next time he entertains he will hire a room if it takes all his salary. He has had enough of this mechanical furniture, and especially bath tubs hidden in sofas.

"Calire," "Sere," Zere."

A "little knowledge" is indeed a "dangerous thing"—at least, it very often leads to make its owner ridiculous. The following conversation among some Dutch entertainers is a sample.

No. 1: "Vas you an awful cold Christmas, now, I tell you. The river was frozen, all to Cincinnati, and the boys used went down twenty degrees below Calire."

No. 2: "Dhere wheels!"

No. 1: "Below Calire, you timberhead. Don't you know what that means? Seems to me the school you vent to was a one horse affair, anyhow."

No. 2: "Vi don't mean anything, you fool!—there's no such thing."

No. 1: "I say there is. You see when it freeze so Calire, it must be pretty cold; so they say so many degrees below Calire."

No. 2: "Ho, ho! You pretend to know! Why, you stupid dunderhead, you've got the wrong word entirely."

No. 1: "What is it, then?"

No. 2: "Why, so many degrees below Nero, of course. I don't know what it means, but I know that's what they always say when it's dreadful cold."

More Than a Match.

A Scotch farmer celebrated in his neighbourhood for his immense strength and skill in the athletic exercises, very frequently had the pleasure of fighting people who came to see if they could settle him or not. Lord D., a great pugilistic amateur, had some from London on purpose to fight the Scot. The latter was working in an outshire, a short distance from his house when the noble lord arrived. His lordship told his horse to a tree, and addressed the farmer—

"I have heard a great deal of talk about you, and I have come a long way to see which of us is the better wrestler."

The Scotchman, without answering, set off the nobleman by the middle of the belt, pitched him over the hedge, and then set about sowing. When him lordship had got himself fairly picked up.

"Well," said the farmer, "have you anything more to say to me?"

"No," replied his lordship, "but perhaps you'd be so good as to throw me my horse."

—Curious typographical errors and verbal combinations occur even in church papers. The New York Churchman of last week reports that "St. Thomas Church, Hyattsville, Maryland, the Rev. Wm. Hopekew, rector, is at once to be redesigned and repaired, and bids are now in hand; the roof will be some 80 dollars."

—"I'm so sorry I can't accompanate you, Mr. Dapperkiff," said Miss Kerrell, shifting her head as she drew out of a Saturday evening, "but my boarders settle weekly. My motto is 'Pay as you go'" "Oh, yes," exclaimed Paperwaite, "so is mine. But I'm not owing yet, you know. I'll be here six months yet."

—"Pat mustn't run fast—not so fast—not so fast—he pot-belly—not to pant for a mile—at the rate of two pints a fine. Short sight, weak ankles, too.

CATHOLIC SCIENTISTS.

Great International Congress in Paris Next Week.

Non-Catholics who think that the Catholic Church is opposed to science, will learn with astonishment that a great International Scientific Congress of Catholics will meet in Paris on next Monday.

The specific and sole object of this Congress is to promote the development of science for the defense of the faith. Theology, in the strict sense of the word, is excluded from its circle of topics. Its direct scope is not Apologetics. It is intended to furnish materials and aids to those who professedly engage in the great work of Christian Apologetics, by directly labouring for the development of the various branches of science. It will occupy itself with the impulse and direction which ought to be given, at the present time, to the scientific researches of Catholics, and with the method to be followed in order to make these researches subservient to the Christian cause without sacrificing anything of the most frank orthodoxy or the most entire scientific sincerity. Natural Theology is included in the programme as a department of Rational Philosophy; and Biblical Science, so far as it is concerned with the relations of the Scriptures to the sciences and secular history, excluding all questions concerning the extent of their inspiration. The commission has invited Catholic scholars and scientists to prepare memoirs and reports, which, after being examined and approved, will be presented to the Congress for discussion, but there will be no votes taken or decisions formulated on their respective topics. The principal objects proposed at those papers will be to determine the points, if any, at which, in relation to those questions which, by their relation to the Christian faith, have a special interest for Catholics. The acts of the Congress will be published, including such papers as may be selected, or abstracts of the same. In this way will gradually be collected an encyclopedia which will be of the greatest value and interest.

VIRGINIA CITY LETTER.

Catholic Concerns on the Comstock.

VIRGINIA CITY, NEV., April 1, 1888.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:—

Dear Sir:—The wonderful yet joyful announcement which the coming of Holy Week always awakens in the Catholic heart, seems to have given a fresh impetus to the Comstock. Our large congregations are the perfect model strangers—St. Mary's in the Mountains—is almost uncomfortably overcrowded at through fall in with the cross, and the Stations of the Cross, which the Blessed Lord underwent during the sorrowful journey, that course around the last solemn act of man's redemption. On Palm Sunday, Holy Thursday, Good Friday, Holy Saturday and Easter Sunday, the Church ceremonies were very impressive, and the Church was crowded to overflowing. Vespers were performed with the solemnity and deeply touched those who all the substantial spiritual benefits under the but the happiest to be present.

The young lady pupils attending St. Mary's school, dressed in garments and trailing robe of spotless white, looked like angels in attendance at Holy Thursday before the Most Blessed Sacrament, while the same horse by Father Lynch, elegantly decorated canopy of silk, fringed with gold pendants, and supported by gilded poles, and spangled in the most exquisite manner, was carried over the consecrated Host by the most marginal acolytes, during the course of the procession around the church. The choir could be congratulated on the Miss M. A. Feeney and Mrs. D. Curran, whose artistic taste, skill and rare and exquisite voices produced a lovely company. The altar of Sepulchre was beautifully decorated with the floral emblems procured from California conservatories by Mrs. Dr. Gallagher, Mrs. Dr. Fleming, Mrs. Dr. Ford, Miss Minnie Leonard and other Comstock Catholic ladies who brought in beautiful flowers where the glory of the Lord dwelleth. Two individual tapers tower about half high around the altar, then resembling a picture set in a frame of gold.

On Easter Sunday morning the high mass was nicely decorated by numerous flowers and well attended notwithstanding the rain. The choir rendered a beautiful mass, which was enjoyed by the congregation. The commission has invited Catholic scholars and scientists to prepare memoirs and reports, which, after being examined and approved, will be presented to the Congress for discussion, but there will be no votes taken or decisions formulated on their respective topics. The principal objects to be aimed at in those papers will be to determine the points, if any, at which, in relation to those questions which, by their relation to the Christian faith, have a special interest for Catholics. The acts of the Congress will be published, including such papers as may be selected, or abstracts of the same. In this way will gradually be collected an encyclopedia which will be of the greatest value and interest.

CRIMELESS IRELAND.

More Cessation Declared Free from Crime.

In addition to the numerous counties reported in last week's MONITOR, where the day has passed by without the following additional evidence of the peaceable condition of the Irish people, even under the present agitating circumstances.

No Trouble in Tyrone.

On the 6th of March, the Tyrone Assizes were opened in Omagh, by Justice Holmes, who, in drawing the Grand Jury, said the cases that had been brought up were very trivial, very few in number. There were only three cases going before the Grand Jury, and none of them were of a serious complexion. It was a matter of the greatest pleasure to every person interested to find Tyrone presenting such an example of peace within its borders. Since the last Winter Assizes only six cases had been reported to the police.

Orangeism Condition of Tipperary.

Mr. Justice Gibson opened the Tipperary Commission on March 5th, and in addressing the grand jury, said there were only a few cases to go before them, which were of a trivial nature. These constituted all the Crown business at the Assizes.

LINES TO GOD'S CHURCH.

(Written on a church bell.)

Church of the triune God, and Bride of Christ!
I serve feel thy Truth and virtue more
Than when some mass-house tongue or vocal hand
Would stetha at thee.

Why, Christ thy Spouse
Was crucified for Truth; and martyrs bled
For principle. Thy mitred leaders bent
Their willing heads to reeking knives, so that Thy name was shielded and their Faith declared.

What wonder, then,
If thy white mantle's stained with hate,
With foul calumniation—aye, with blood;
What wonder if thy virtue is severe;
What matter if thy spirit is unharmed;
What matter if Christ ministers to thee!

Still be thy task the savior of the world;
Still be thy hope the cleanser of souls;
Still be thy faith the promise made by Christ.
Still be thy step, strong men will bear thee on;
If foes beset thee, Can will hurl them back;
If dark the hour, new suns will light thy way.

Far—yonder Church—this sun—departing ship
That leaves its haven on a lengthened cruise
With large well-wishes and supervise shores,
So dim! this light journey through the earth
Amidst our prayers, our blessings and our tears
For we are with thee on the vastness way,
And Faith, thy pilot, in temptatious hours
Can be alone by to fit the crouching mist,
And show thee where thy destination lies!

MEMORIES OF THE PAST.

The past, the long-remembered past,
Dwell on each scene however gay,
Yet sorrow's cloud will sometimes cast
Its shadow on the fairy way.

Still on the past I love to dwell,
And wake the dreams of youthful glow,
Because those memories fondly tell
A story tinged with joy or woe.

The joy I love, because 'twas joy,
The woe, no pain may cause me now;
Such dreams are never more annoy,
Nor blanch with care my lips or brow.

I love to wake those happy dreams
Of memories of the fairy past,
When Hope's bright star shed forth her beams,
Too brilliant to be glow to last.

Oh, the days of joy and pleasure
I oft remember fondly still,
And those days I'll always treasure
With heart filled by deeper thrill.

Each scene, like some enchanting song,
Still above me on life's onward way,
And though I join the worldly throng,
The past still holds a deathless sway.

Still as I ponder o'er the past,
What cherished hopes from memory spring—
Of youthful joys that could not last,
Vows breath pledged by mighty king.

I would not, if I could, recall
One moment of "the long ago"
But let Time's somber curtain fall
Upon the joy and woe.

TIDINGS FROM OVER THE SEA.

Over the sea, the beautiful sea,
A white-winged message is wafted to me;
Over the waves and freshening spray
Where the sunbeams dance and the mermaids play;
From a peaceful home in the Mohawk vale,
Fragrant with blossoms that fill each gale,
Like a breath from a better world to me
In this living message from over the sea.

Over the sea, the calm summer sea,
Memoirs pictures reflected to me,
Faces and scenes that I loved so well,
Cast around me a mystic spell;
And down through the wonderous vista of years,
They are shining to-day in the haze of hazes,
Riding before us, sweet memories of them,
Beautiful bones o'er the billowy sea.

A cottage half hid 'mmh the jessamine vine,
The shady elm, the towering pine,
The deep-toned grass, the silver plume
Of limpid brook and moss-edged stream,
Where, we paddled our skiffs and whiled away
The long bright hours of the summer day,
The merry peals of our children's glee
Are resounding today o'er the wide-spreading sea.

But Time's rude pinions have swept the air,
And change has introduced even there,
Many are few gone from the dear old home,
Afar in the great wide world to roam;
The young ones are pacing the familiar plain
In lighted by many a stranger face,
And some rest under the Church-yard tree,
Just beside the old home-stead over the sea.

Home of my childhood over the sea,
My truest heart turns fondly to thee,
For there I have there is perfect rest
From the billows of trouble and care's behest;
And often I think I shall wander again
Away from the noisy hamlets of men,
To find that coveted peace with thee,
Beautiful home o'er the memories sea!

Dangerous Anti-Catholic Literature.

The Sacramento Bee seems to have been hit in a vital spot by the MONITOR when we recently gave its true character as both an anti-Catholic and anti-Christian publication. Our opinion was based upon the fact that we have read the Bee very carefully for some time, and the conclusion we have come to is that the Bee belongs to that class of newspapers which is far better outside than inside the homes of Catholics, where there are children whose minds are easily poisoned by reading the anti-Catholic and anti-Christian sentiments with which its leading articles are interlarded.

One of the duties incumbent upon a Catholic journalist is to caution Catholic parents against the insidious poison which is distilled by the secular press and distributed broadcast over the land. The Prelates of the Third Plenary Council, which met in Baltimore in 1884, issued a Pastoral Letter wherein they cautioned their Catholic flocks against just such papers as the Sacramento Bee, whose constant stings at Christianity in general bring it within the category of papers denounced by the American Bishops in the following extract from their Pastoral Letter, Speaking of the dangerous literature which floods the country and which tends to destroy the faith in those youthful souls where it is not fortified by experience in the nature of the weapons used by the enemies of God's Church, here is the language of the Pastoral:

"Not only should the immoral, the vulgar, the sensational novel; the indecently illustrated newspaper, and publications tending to weaken faith in the religion and the Church of Jesus Christ, be absolutely excluded from every Catholic home," say the Prelates who have charge of the souls of the Catholics in America, "but the dangerously exciting and the morbidly emotional, whatever, in a word, is calculated to imperil, or even the loss of faith and morals in the youthful mind or heart, should be carefully excluded."

Such is the line of conduct pointed out by the American Prelacy for Catholics to follow, and an examination has convinced us that the Sacramento Bee comes within the category of papers condemned by the Council for the reason that it glories in scoffing at Christianity in general and Catholicity in particular. Such is even gone out to where as a newspaper to condemn [illegible] and mass and Christian principles [illegible] sonable pleasures of young and old, it has risen above all religious restrictions.

A paper that thus both openly and covertly assails Christianity, "is calculated, in the language of the Pastoral Letter we have quoted, "to impair or lower the tone of faith or morals in the youthful mind or heart, and it should be carefully excluded."

Those young Catholics read in the Bee that "if Christ himself were living to-day he would not see a trace of Christianity in any prevailing religion," (see the Bee issue of last week) the faith and the morals of such children of the true Church are likely to be lowered if not materially impaired. And when youthful Catholics find a paper that is a daily visitor to their homes boldly declaring that were the Son of God to enter one of our churches, we doubt not that He would be tempted to drive out preachers and deacons as He drove out the money-changers in the Temple," their minds become imbued with the infidel idea that Catholic faith is a fraud, and that Catholics and deacons are those included in the denunciatory declaration by the anti-Christian Bee, and therefore they listen to sermons from Catholic "preachers" with that listless indifference and inattention which are the sure premonitory symptoms of the growth of the weeds of infidelity in those sacred gardens in which good Catholic parents earnestly endeavor to cultivate the beautiful flowers of Catholic faith planted in pure souls of God's creation.

According to the Bee neither Christianity or Christian ceremonies are necessary to economy. All a Catholic child has to do is to grow up as best he can outside of religious influences—which are characterized by the anti-Christian Bee as "a system of pot-pot glory"—then be honest if he can; refrain from stealing or cheating—if he can; and to shape his daily life according to the materialistic mold in which a vivid worshiping poet cast the imaginary form of a perfect man!

Have Catholic parents no better literary pabulum for their children than such a paper as the Sacramento Bee, whose motto that his Thoughts should become the theological text-book for Catholic youth! Hypnut was the author of a series of most godly anti-Catholic communications on "Catholicity in Mexico," which he published in his paper—the New York Post. Moreover, this same individual, who seems to be the Bee's sole divinity, acknowledged no higher God than nature! And yet, in the face of both these convincing facts, the Bee endeavors to make its readers believe that it is not an anti-Christian paper!

The Bee charges the MONITOR with being bigoted in its Catholic belief, and it also alleges that we do not believe half of what we say. But from our standpoint of faith bigotry as a foreign to our mind as Christian Truth is to the belief of the Sacramento Bee. So far from being bigoted, we believe there are millions of laxjudged non-Catholics who are following out the dictates of their individual conscientious according to the little spiritual light they have, and we appreciate to a greater decree the conduct of such among our separated brethren than we do the degeneracy of those apostate Catholics whose only aim in life seems to be to shower slander and contumely upon the Church that made them Christians.

The Bee says the MONITOR can see no good in anything that does not deserve our approval, our applause, and our approving nod. Well, we should say that The Church of God condemns everything appertaining to Christianity that does not meet her approval, applause and approbation, and as a consistent Catholic we always feel that we are beneath Salvation's shadow when we fight our polemical contests beneath the Church crowned with the Cross of Christ.

The Bee, therefore, is sadly mistaken in its measurement of the MONITOR's Christian rule of conduct. In rain also does it plead that it is not both anti-Catholic and anti-Christian so long as we can call them [illegible] columns such broad-gauged infidel sentiments as those we have outlined. We do not either ask or expect the Bee to show the Catholic Church any special favor in its columns, but we do expect from every secular paper received into Catholic homes that its columns shall be free from that Satanic style of latter-day literature which stands at sanctity and includes our Divine Church in the mass of miscellaneous sects from which "preachers and deacons" would be driven by the Son of God if he were in the world to-day. From papers which inform Catholic children that bigoted Bryant's Thanatopsis is good enough gospel upon which the lives of men may be governed, every Catholic parent should pray—"good Lord Deliver us!"

The "Glories of Mary" Criticised

A gentleman who signs himself "A Liberal Protestant and a constant reader of the MONITOR," sends us a copy of the Sign of the Times in which recently appeared several incomplete extracts from the great work of St. Alphonsus Liguori—The Glories of Mary. Alluding to the extracts in question our friend asks:

"Can these be correct, or are they lies and libels?" The extracts are correct as far as they go, but—like all Protestant practices of the past—the text is mutilated for the purpose of misleading the Catholics. The Glories of Mary has been published and circulated throughout the whole Christian world for more than a century. It is to be found in the libraries of Popes, Cardinals, Bishops, priests and good Catholics, and it contains within its covers the best refutation of the false meaning attributed to its contents by the Oakland paper. The work, moreover, has the approval of episcopal authority.

Fortunately for the cause of truth, Almighty God permitted the Glories of Mary to be severely criticised by Catholic enlightened during the life-time of St. Alphonsus Liguori, and by this means this great work of God and friend of the Mother of Mercy was enabled to add additional strength to every sentence he wrote concerning the power which Mary exercises through the plenitude of grace she receives from Almighty God.

Non-Catholics cannot have the slightest conception of the supernatural power Mary possesses, because they look upon her merely as an ordinary mortal who lived and died and went to Heaven. Beyond what the Sacred Scriptures say—and Holy Writ says but little of Mary—their knowledge does not extend, hence they are naturally horrified when they read that the Blessed Virgin can secure the alteration of the souls of repentant sinners. Such is the feeling, doubtless, that actuated the non-Catholic gentleman who reads the MONITOR, and who asks that we notice the charges made by the Sign of the Times. It must be borne in mind, however, that the seeming attributed to St. Alphonsus Liguori's language by the Oakland paper is the individual opinion of an unauthorized Wayback preacher named Waggoner, which the Glories of Mary was written by a saint and its precepts have benefited thousands upon thousands of souls during the past century. Hence Wayback Waggoner is best only an absurd individual whose objection to the language of St. Alphonsus Liguori are the outcome of ignorance influenced by heretical hate.

If "Liberal Protestant" will call at the MONITOR office we will let him have a copy of the Glories of Mary to read, and we will prove to him by ten numerical references in the work, that Wayback Waggoner would meet with the latter success behind a white wash brush that he does as the critic of a saint of the Catholic Church.

The Pope to the President.

The following autograph letter has been presented by Cardinal Gibbons to President Cleveland:

TO OUR BELOVED SON, JAMES GIBBONS, PRIEST OF HOLY ROME, AMERICAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. Age, Benedictions to Beloved Son, Health and Benedictions.

Among countless congratulations which we have received from all parts of the world upon the occasion of the fifteenth anniversary of our elevation to the priesthood, we have, as was natural, set the most store by the evidences of courtesy and respect sent by the rulers of nations. For by these marks of their good will toward the head of the Church they manifest, and this we ardently desired, their kindly dispositions towards their Catholic subjects.

Since then the illustrious President of the United States has through you, our beloved son, seen fit to exhibit a like courtesy, accompanying the expression of the same with the gift of a superb copy of the Constitution of the most powerful republic, he has in so doing afforded us peculiar pleasure and satisfaction.

Moreover, as it is fitting that we should return to his Excellency the expression of our gratitude, we commit the discharge of that duty to you, both on account of your exalted rank in the hierarchy of this country and the personal esteem in which his Excellency holds you.

In fulfilling this duty we desire you should assure the President of our admiration for the Constitution of that United States, not only because it has enabled its authors and enterprising citizens to attain so high a degree of prosperity, but because under its protection your Catholic countrymen have enjoyed that liberty which so manifestly promoted the marvelous growth of their religion, and will, as in the past, we trust, enable it in the future to be of the highest advantage to civil society.

We, as you will be pleased to add, will pour forth frequent prayers to God for your country's constant advance, glory and prosperity, and for the health and long life of the President.

Finally, to you beloved son and to the faithful intrusted to your pastoral care, lovingly in the Lord, We impart our apostolic benediction.

Given at Rome at St. Peter's, this 4th day of February, in the year of our Lord, 1888, and the tenth of our Pontificate.

CONTROVERTED POINTS IN CATHOLIC MATTERS.

6.—Providential Preservation of the Society of Jesus in Prussia and White Russia, and its Restoration by Pope Pius VII., August 7, 1814—Other Calumnies of Dr. Littledale Exposed and Refuted.

Continuing the many historical falsehoods and barefaced calumnies that, thanks to honest and conservative Littledale, disgrace the pages of the Encyclopedia Britannica (vol. xxiii., p. 645-656, Article on the Jesuits) are to be reckoned the following, which concern the existence of the Society of Jesus in Prussia and Russia after the time of the Brief of Suppression, and its complete restoration throughout the Catholic world by Pope Pius VII. of happy memory. Desiring to furnish to the readers of the Encyclopedia some specimens of his historical trustworthiness, on reaching the period of the Suppression of the Society (p. 655) he boldly asserts: 1st, That "far from submitting to the Papal Brief, the Jesuits after some ineffectual attempts at direct resistance, withdrew into the territories of the non-Roman Catholic sovereigns of Russia and Prussia, Catherine II. and Frederick II." 2nd, That "two legged Briefs were specially circulated implying the repeal of the Brief of Suppression." 3rd, That "they also pleaded a verbal approbation by Pius VI., but no proof of either its existence or its validity is forthcoming." 4th, That "Pius VII. which he re-established the Society, omitted all vindication of the Jesuits from the heavy charges in the Brief of Suppression."

In these four statements of our learned and fair-minded divines we detect several flagrant falsehoods. To begin with the first, the real facts, as revealed by historical documents and unimpeachable authority, are simply these. In the first place, as the preservation of the Society in Prussia and Russia directly and principally concerns the members, that were already long established in those countries, we fail to see the truth of the broad statement that the Jesuits withdrew into those regions. With regard to the temporal survival of the Society in Prussia, 1773—1786, Frederick II., who had succeeded to the throne in 1740, with all his profession of infidelity, was too keen a statesman to sanction so religious annihilation, men who were valuable instruments in lirthering the interests, culture and prosperity of his subjects. Hence, when the Brief of Suppression appeared, Frederick forbade its publication within his dominions, and informed the Pope of his mission to maintain the Jesuits. He seems to have had some presentiment of his future attitude in this matter, when on July 7, 1773, he thus wrote to Voltaire: "That good Francisco of the Vatican leaves me my dear Jesuits, who are persecuted everywhere else. I will preserve this precious seed, so as to be able one day to supply it to such as may desire again to cultivate this rare plant." Clement XIV. could not exact obedience from a monarch outlying the limits of the Church, and the Bishops fearing disastrous consequences to the cause of Catholicity, if they contravened the order of their temporal sovereign, declined to interfere. The Jesuits themselves were unwilling to accept the protection thus extended to them, and persisted in their desire to submit themselves unreservedly to the Brief of Suppression. According to the wording of the Pontiff himself, the Brief was not binding unless canonically promulgated by the Bishops in their respective Dioceses; this was not done for the reasons given above, hence the continuance of the Society in the Prussian State was both legal and justifiable. However, all anxiety on account of it was entirely removed by the accession of Pius VI., who, in a letter addressed to King Frederick, informed him that he was willing to take all the name he considered fitting for the maintenance of the Society in Prussia, and that under such a name and title, free from all disobedience to the Holy See continue to live in community, and discharge the duties of their institute. In the face of these facts, the attempt of such a man as Dr. Littledale to make the Jesuits withdraw into other regions, and which everyone can easily verify for himself, our readers know well, is simply the result of his offended pride. Clement XIV. continued himself to words of simple exhortation—the Jesuits were free to act as they thought fit, and the Bishops of Prussia, the sovereigns and the Pope, by their conduct, gave the Jesuits to understand that they approved of their continuance in Prussia. Having wrested from Poland part of White Russia and part of Livonia in 1772, she found among her new subjects two hundred Jesuits, who were in possession of four colleges and many smaller houses. Catherine was strongly advised to dispense with their services at once; but she happened to have a will of her own, and determined to keep the Jesuits herself rather than yield to politics. Time of her minority, bolder than the rest, ventured to remind her that Inter Crassas was not a law in Russia, but only in her Russia, but Catherine quietly asked if she, as Empress, was expected to possess the power which Peter possessed, and when all her dutiful courtiers bowed affirmatively, she said that, no doubt, Peter may have had the right to do what he pleased in the law in question, and that she had also good reasons for restricting it. "If they misbehave they can be dismissed at any time, and it will not be more easy to put me among into this field." In September, 1773, came the news of the suppression of the whole Society by Clement XIV. Catherine at once dispatched peremptory orders to all the Catholic Bishops within her dominions forbidding them under the severest penalties from promulgating the Brief, and enjoining on all the Jesuits to remain at their posts and attend to their duties as before, asserting there at the same time, that she would unmeritably take the Jesuits ought to obey the Pope in matters which concern the Dogmas of religion. In other respects it is your duty to obey your Sovereign. I perceive that you are zealous. I shall send instructions to my Ambassador at Warsaw to convert monastery of the Emperors, and commanding them to go on as before till they received further orders. The right course of action was now no longer doubtful. The Brief of Suppression either was sufficiently promulgated to demand the obedience of the Jesuits or it was not. If it was not, they were still bound by their vows and obliged to go on as before. If it was, they were clearly subject to their Bishop in accordance with the provisions of the same Brief, and by their Bishop they were forbidden to disband and commanded to remain at their posts.

A few years later when Joseph II. of Austria visited Russia, he inquired from the Bishop of Mohilow how it happened that the Society of Jesus suppressed throughout Europe still flourished in that Empire, and he received the following laconic, but expressive reply: "Pippin indopte, nu pendrive pabrelu, Russo Iesuite"—It is because of the needs of the people, the consent of the Empress, and the silence of Rome.—Pamphlet to her princess Catherine wrote to Rome and obtained from Clement XIV. a Decree, dated June 9, 1774, authorizing the Jesuits of White Russia to remain in statu quo till further notice. This is perhaps one of the two Briefs, which our honorable Littledale charges the Jesuits with having forged and circulated from their headquarters in Rome with a view to sanction their rebellion and freshness existence. Those of our readers who are acquainted with the noble dignity and truthful sequence of the Ex-Jesuit contributor to the Encyclopedia know by this time what to think of our remarks.

Listen to, at the accession of Pius VI., the Empress dispatched to Rome a special messenger bearing her autograph letter to the Pope, in which she thus summed up her motives for providing the Jesuits: "The Society of peaceful and innocent men continues to remain in my Empire because, among all Catholic Orders, they are the best fitted to instruct my subjects, and to inspire them with the true principles of Christianity. I am resolved to support these priests against any power whatsoever, and in doing so I only fulfill my duty for I am their Sovereign and I regard them as faithful, innocent and useful subjects." Pope Pius VI., replied to the Empress by a verbal sanction conveyed in these precise words reported by Cathrein—"Appoints Sacrisstatus, Jesus in Albo Rosso Deputation, opposito, opposito."—I approve the existence of the Society of Jesus in White Russia; yes, I approve it, I approve it.—The verbal approval, technically called "viva voce" which, according to Cathrein, "Jesuits and furthermore, our quite a sufficient answer in the judgment of Catherine, and Jesuits, signifying all scruples from the minds of the Jesuit Fathers, it justified their existence in the eyes of all Europe, and afforded to many former members of the Society a strong inducement to join their brethren in Russia, as a substitute of them actually did.

It is highly interesting to see how closely Cardinal Valenzi follows the one memorial bearing his signature and seal, addressed to Pius VI. under date of the 1st of April, 1785, from the Palace of Ravagnan, S. J., in his History of Clement XIII. and Clement XIV., (Rome, 1887, p. 426). Valenzi, in his Preface, says he has taken the following extracts, which are of the highest importance, from the Archives of the Vatican, and he thus concludes: "Thus Brief of Clement XIV., was not published in Russia and Prussia, and, as the Bishop of the Brief itself, was charged to make it known, and to superintend its execution, from secret, it remained, and yet, in fact, The Jesuits in Russia remained accordingly in peaceful possession of what had belonged to them in 24 years under the auspices of among Holla and Brida of numerous Pontiffs; that is to say, they continued to be true Jesuits. In this where is their choice? Where their disorders? The Bishop did not communicate the Brief, because the Court of St. Petersburg forbade its publication under pain of severe disciplinary enactments do not bind with such grave consequences. Besides, even Catholic Sovereigns had a law of the transmission of the Brief without imposing blame, not only for the reasons just alleged, but also from the form of expression used by the very Pope who suppressed the Society; for Clement XIV. continued himself to words of simple exhortation—the Jesuits were free to act as they thought fit, and of His ends for the salvation of souls. Are the Jesuits in Russia, then, guilty of disobedience to the Holy Ghost, through the expulsion of the Society from Rome? Are the Jesuits in Russia, then, the flourishing remnants established by the Jesuits in Russia, yet it produced a very important effect in the Jesuits in Russia. At the time of its restoration the Order in other countries of Europe, it was composed of two hundred and fifty, who had survived the ruin of the Society, who, alone in Europe, had continued to live in the old habit. In the meantime, four lifetimes had passed, and the Jesuits in Russia, which had grown to a number of 1,000, of which 400 were Jesuits, and the rest were Novices

How to Drink Milk.

"What did you drink?" asked the doctor.

"Nothing that could have made me sick, I am sure," replied the patient. "Only a glass of milk."

"Did you drink it quickly?"

"No quicker than usual."

"Humph!—Now, the one great fault of the age is the use of the word of advice. Many persons complain that they cannot drink milk without being 'disposed by it.' The most common reason why milk is not well borne is due to the fact that people generally drink it too quickly. If a glass of it is swallowed hastily it enters the stomach and then forms in one solid, curdled mass, difficult of digestion. If, on the other hand, the same quantity is sipped, and three minutes, at least, is occupied in drinking it, then, on reaching the stomach, it is so divided, that when coagulated, as it must always be by the gastric juice while digestion is going on, instead of being in one hard, condensed mass, upon the outside only of which the digestive fluids can act, it is more in the form of a sponge, and in and out of the entire bulk the gastric juice can freely play to perform its function. Milk may be rendered more digestible, and, for many, of more agreeable taste, if prepared by slowly adding a few drops of dilute hydrochloric acid to it, drop by drop, stirring it the same time. By this means the curd is broken up, and it is in a more favorable state to be acted upon by the digestive fluids. You follow my advice and you will have no more attacks like the one you are troubled with to-day. Two dollars, please. Good day."

Believed That Buttermilk Cured Her.

A woman of this city who had been prone to scold by her physician to be fitted with an consumption, and who was apparently dying as fast as that slow young disease could carry her off, was told by a neighbor that she had been assisting a lady in churning and had much enjoyed a drink of buttermilk. "Buttermilk!" fairly screamed the invalid, "how I wish that I could have a drink!" And from that time till her friend could go to the house where the churning had taken place and bring the longed-for draught, she raved and cried for it. She drank it and felt better. Then another churning was hurried up, and she drank again. The lady made her churnings more frequent and used to please the dying woman.

In a little while the news was brought that she was improving. A few days later she was out of danger. A week elapsed and she was on her feet and about the house. And now she is again a bustling, busy woman, not strong, but in apparently good health, with no symptoms of a deadly disease lurking around. There is no doubt, she says, the buttermilk cured her. A physician says "it was right in the spot." It nourished her poor, famished body, filled up the dried out tissues, and gave her strength and coverage. Neighbors say that she is proud of her money, and that probably much of her illness was due to her reluctance to pay for palatable and nourishing food. The buttermilk was given to her.

What Is Stale Bread?

The stale crumb may be regarded as the framework of gluten coated with glony, dried starch, not readily dissolved by the saliva. But by heating the hydration of gluten is driven out. The starch is moistened and the whole crumb, recovering the elasticity of fresh bread, is palatable. On cooling, the water is withdrawn from the starch and restored to the gluten, and the bread becomes stale.

Now as stale bread is the most easily digested it deserves to be restored to palatability, and this can be easily done by reheating it, as we have seen. It should be done in a covered dish, so as to prevent loss of moisture. Thus reheated it renews its youth, but does not resume the qualities that make fresh bread indigestible. It is these possible to combine the taste of fresh bread with the virtues of stale bread, and the process is one that should be familiar in every house where cereal food continues to be the staff of life.

The Value of Love.

The love of a true, sincere heart is more to be prized than the wealth of the Indies; it is pastile of childish voices, the purity that slumbers in their lilies, implanted there by the true harmony dwelling in the souls of pure whom God has joined together, is a mine of unbounded wealth. Too, boy! wrestling with your reticed stock, gold bonds, and boasted wealth, don't you think the prattle of infant voices would make sweet music to your ear, and children caresses outset the blushing selling here! What have you to give in exchange for such happiness? Well I would that every one had in her possession, guaranteed unto them, the transfer of which might be compelled to their posterity, this expression of true wealth—Love at home.

Cure for Rheumatism.

A correspondent of the English Magazine says: "Let all of 'cars' know the following. My wife was suffered excessively with acute rheumatism in her feet, with painful swelling, completely taking her off her feet for several days at a time. The following remedy was recommended recently and tried, and took away the agonizing pain in less than fifteen minutes, and she can now walk very fairly, and in a couple of days she will be able to better her boots, and walk without a stick or crutch: one quart of milk, quite hot, into which stir one ounce of alum; this makes curds and whey. Bathe the part affected with the whey until too cold. In the meantime keep the curds hot, and after bathing put them on a poultice, wrap in flannel, and—go to sleep (you can). These applications should be a perfect cure, even in aggravated cases.

White Meats.

Bishop Kaiser, of Green Bay, speaking of the terms of the Roman Index says:

"The translation 'white meats' for the Latin word 'lacticinia' has been misunderstood by many. Some dictionaries (also Webster's edition) explain white meats to mean "young or delicate flesh, or veal, poultry, rabbits, and so forth."

The Lenten regulations of the several Dioceses translate the spirit of the Roman Index in this manner. They exclude all flesh meats, and the term "white meats," so far as it describes permissible food, refer to eggs, fish, oysters, etc.

Bear Boston!

A tramp applied at the back door of a house on U street, Washington City, for something to eat, and the mistress let him in.

"Madam," he said with a formal bow, "I crave some nutritious element."

"Hunter," she added to the cook, "there is a man here who wants something to eat, bring out that plate of pork and beans."

"Ah, madam," he said, lifting the dish as a soft light shone in his face, "a fellow feeling makes one wondrous kind;" used to reside in dear Boston, myself."

Family Fun.

Tickling Thoughts.

Two girls sat in a car a few evenings ago. We won't have to ride in these kinds of cars any more, after a while," said one, we're going to have electric cars here."

"Is that so?" queried No. 2. "How do they go, by steam or by weather?"

"I don't know," replied No. 1, "but I think they go by weather."

Mr. Dunenberry—"What nonsense it one newspapers study out! Now, here's a statement that widows are more likely to die than widowers."

Mr. D.—"That's all bosh, my dear. The fact is that a man generally dies before his widow."

Mrs. D.—"Is that really the case. How do you account for it?"

Mr. D.—"I can't."

Benhen—"It's too bad 'bout Wilsung bein' out o' work. I'm 'fraid he'll be kinder hard work to make both ends meet" Pete (who has never heard the expression before) "Th-la ends meet, eh! Well, judgin' by his present circumstances, he'll be mighty lucky, if he kin make one end weetable."

Photographer—"Excuse me, sir, but if you could look a little more pleasant—"

Wild-looking Countryman—"Don't be nervous, young man. I'm not a-force ex I look."

"Well, old fellow, it's all settled. I am going to be married in two months. You will be one of the witnesses, I hope."

"O man upon me. I never desert a friend in adversities."

Friend, to widow, mourning her third husband—"I sympathize deeply with you, my dear Mrs. Black, and was sorry not to see you in your hour of affliction."

Widow, sadly—"Ah, my friend, you do not know what it is to lose husbands."

A young mother looked through twenty-six novels to find a name for her girl baby, and finally settled on Marier.

"Uncle Rufus, I am very sorry to hear that you have lost your wife."

"Neber mind, boss; neber mind. I'ad de experience."

Old lady, to saleswoman—"You don't seem to possess the patience of Job, young woman."

Saleswoman—No, ma'am; but Job never worked in a dry goods store.

He Saved Him.

He had just taken hold of a coat hanging in front of a second-hand store when the weighed proprietor jumped out and inquired:

"Was you going to buy some coats?"

"Well, I was out o' looking."

"Would you like to buy for cash?"

"Why, I'm ready to pay some cash, of course. I think I'll buy on the installment plan.

"Dat settles it. We dean do some possessions on dat plan any more."

"What's the matter?"

"My friends, I tell you all should it. Suppose I sell you dot coat by der week."

"Cos."

"And ether you pays me too weeks you shan you outer and kin?"

"Yes."

"Dot makes me have a lien on your estate dean't! I had to tie a claim und sendt a judge. You is stickdown dedt, und so I put in my bill dot you owe me six hoonered dollars."

"That's fraud."

"So he shas, but I put in my bill und der Sheriff came und he sold your estate goes up. I gife my lawyer two hoonered, und keep four hoonered, und your family goes by der poorhouse."

"Would you do that?"

"Why, of course. Dot shas I tell you. Dot weekly payment shas such a temptation dean't I can't resist it. Dot shas, in reasonity, but you see nopody can find me und is free. If you pay dem dot coat shas tree dollar. If you pay by der week ha shas also dollar, und if you don't shump on your estate mit a claim for six hoonered. Dot makes me a rascal, und if you shas my friendt, und like to see me lif like some honest man, I peg of you to pay me cash down."

"Um! I see. Well, I'll pay cash for the coat. If I can save you from committing a crime it is my duty to do so.

"O course he shas. My friendt, shas yoda. You shas an honest man. You hif saved me from doing a wicked thing, and some tears shas shed in my eyes. I make dot coat cost worry cheap, to you, but still you shas an honest; I put in the paper sollare—No. 18—and may shas you like some clothes come und see me."

Be Weakened on Nosh.

A hired man who had been employed on a farm in this country for several months entered suit against his employer the other day for balance of wages, amounting, as he claimed, to $22. The suit was on trial yesterday, and it looked at first as if the plaintiff had a clear case. His gaze dates and figures in a straightforward way, and seemed a very honest young man.

When the farmer took the stand, he said "I claim an offset for the $22. No man need owe me for what I honestly owe."

"What is your offset?" asked the lawyer.

"He's an unbeliever."

"In what?"

"Why, in the Bible."

"What has that to do with your owing him $22?"

"It has a hoep to do with it. I had six hands in my employ, and we were ranking things when I hired this guy. He held a been with us two days when they stopped the reaper in the middle of the forenoon to dispute about Daniel in the lion's den, and in three days we had a regular knock down over the whale swallowing Jonah. The man who runs the mower got to arguing about Samson, and drove over a stump and damaged the machine to the tune of $18, and the very next day my hay burner, Jim, and while climbing the fence to hear and see the row started over Shadrach and Meshach and the Red Sea. It wasn't a week before my wife and kids fell to fighting for the Jews by the rescue, and hanged if I didn't feed myself growing weak on Noah and his flood. That's my offset, sir, and if he was worth anything I'd use him for $1,000 besides.

Cold Comfort.

They were sitting round the stove in a grocery, when the man with the red grizzly spoke up and said: "It must be a relief to be cast away on an ocean-girt island."

"Bunker yer life," replied one of the others. "Well, I don't know about that," said the grower, I ought-fully. "You don't. Why how would it help but be awful?" "Its the island supposed to be uninhabited!" "Of course." "Oh, that makes a difference. I didn't know but that it was inhabited by a grocer who keeps a red hot stove, and a barrel of apples for the convenience of loafers." "Then a deep shadow fell upon the island in the ler-of Pacific, and one after another the wrecked sailors went out on some errand or other.

RELIGIOUS RECEPTION.

Impressive Ceremony in St. Joseph's Cathedral, Sacramento.

Last Friday afternoon there was witnessed at the Convent chapel of the Sisters of Mercy in Sacramento a beautiful ceremony, the occasion being the reception into the Order of six young ladies as Novices. Bishop Manogue officiated, assisted by Rev. Thos. Grace. The following clergy occupied the sanctuary: Rev. T. Hanglo, Sacramento; Rev. P. Scanlan, Rev. Wm. Kerr, Rev. Peter Dillon, all of Sacramento; Rev. F. D. Lucas, Dunlap; Rev. T. Ryan, Oakley; Rev. J. Wilson, Marysville; Rev. Father Herbode, Woodland.

The chapel was handsomely decorated; the altar beautiful with flowers, and interspersed with vases of fragrant flowers, was very bright and pretty.

At three o'clock p. m. the Sisters entered the chapel in procession, headed by a cross bearer and closed by the young aspirants to the religious life, who were attired in bridal robes and conducted by the Rev. Mother and assistant. The cross bearer entered the sanctuary first. The choir intoned the "O Gloriosa Virginum." The usual preliminary ceremonies were then performed.

Bishop Manogue addressed the young ladies in a most impressive manner on the nature of the obligations they were about to contract, at the same time encouraging them by bringing before them the luminous rewards of Heaven for the sacrifice which these obligations entail. The discourse, though not lengthy, was most instructive, and the earnestness of the Bishop evidently touched the hearts of many of his audience, as well as those of the young ladies directly addressed.

At the conclusion of the sermon the young ladies were conducted to the altar and interrogated by the Bishop as to their determination to enter the religious life of a Sister of Mercy. On their replying in the affirmative in a very earnest manner, they were permitted to exchange their worldly robes for the humble garb of religious.

The names of the young ladies are as follows: Miss Liston, in religion Sister Mary Dolores; Miss Davis, in religion Sister Mary Antonia; Miss Atkinson, in religion Sister Mary Stanislaus; Miss Somers, in religion Sister Mary Columba.

At the conclusion of the ceremony Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament was given, after which the clergy and religious retired in processional order.

CATHOLIC LADIES' AID SOCIETY.

—Mrs. M. Ryan and Mrs. A. J. McDonough were selected as delegates to the Grand A. S. No. 1, to the annual election of officers in A. O. H.

—The social of U. I. A. S. No. 1 was held last Wednesday evening at Cavalry Hall, and was a grand success. Mr. Fitzpatrick and other artists kindly volunteered their services for the occasion. Following is the programme: Piano and violin solo, Miss A. Thibault and Master E. Harbert; solo by song, Josh Davis; piano solo, Miss Mary Shaughnessy; song, "My Not Farewell," Miss Julia Robinson; recitation, Miss Annie M. Sullivan; vocal duet, Miss M Sullivan and Miss Harrington; comic selections, Master F. Thibault; piano and violin duet, Miss M. Sullivan and Prof. Manning; comic selections, Wm. McGuire; song, Miss May Flynn.

The programme received well merited applause, and the ladies deserve credit for compiling the half was elegantly filled. The committee in charge gave great credit for the manner in which they performed their work, there being no jarring or unpleasantness. The following are the members of the social committee: Mrs. M. Ryan, Miss B. Culhane, Mrs. W. Hamon, Miss M. Smyth and Miss A. Houlihan.

—Rev. J. B. McNally was departed for Europe on Tuesday last, was presented with an address, accompanied by a travelling-case, from U. A. C. No. 1, on last Sunday. The Reverend gentleman was much pleased and complimented the ladies of the Society on the noble work in which they are engaged, and said they had done a vast deal of good in Catholic circles.

—The programme for the annual picnic of the U. A. A. S. No. 1, to be held at Shell Mound Park on May Day, promises to be one in every particular, as all the parishes are taking a lively interest in the affair.

IN MEMORIAM.

MRS. ANDREW MANNING

On last Thursday evening, after only a few days' illness, Mrs Andrew Manning of 1272 Howard st., peacefully breathed her last, surrounded by her family and fortified by the last Sacraments of the Church.

Mrs. Manning was born in County Kilkenny, Ireland, in December, 1833, and was consequently, at the time of her demise, not yet 55 years of age. She resided in San Francisco early in the fifties, and, if memory serves, was married to Martin County where she resided for many years followed by the duties of giving her children a good education, however, Mrs. Manning, several years since removed to the City of San Francisco and joined her husband and children. Her home was a place of rare delight to her friends, many of whom, if not of Irish and Roman Catholic descent, Mrs. Manning had nothing undone to give her children a Catholic education. Her sacrifices in behalf of her children, her patience and kindness, may remain a chastening and beneficial memory in the hearts of her children. Charitable without ostentation, kind and sincere in all things, she endeared those characteristics which make a loving wife, a tender and devoted mother, and a sincere friend.

The funeral took place on Friday; and the large number who attended, testified to the regard in which the deceased was held. The remains were taken from the residence to the Church of the Sacred Heart, where which the obsequies were celebrated by Father Brady, assisted by Father Caron, and a sermon was preached by Father Brady, in which he spoke of the deceased as a Christian mother, and a true friend to her children and family. The pall bearers were Messrs. Thos. Grace, Thos. Ryan, Thos. Ryan, Jr., Thos. Ryan, Jr., Thos. Ryan, Jr.,

[FOR THE MONITOR.]

A DIRGE

Under the billowy waves of the sea
That struggle against the shore,
Down in the depths of the ocean lies
To rise again no more.
The silent dead sleep peacefully,
'Mid the ocean's ceaseless roar.

In the desert soil of the far-off East,
Where hot winds scorch and rave;
Where the burning sun on his fortunes scowls
Looks down on many a grave,
As steady as brooding lights that gloom
At the head of a church's nave,

In the solemn shadow of forests grim,
That sense imperiously,
The traveller skirt and sad spoot,
Kneels down full wearily,
And 'mid the dirge of the forest chorus,
Forsaken mortality:

Within those northern ice-bound lands,
Where snows eternal rest,
Still there with life's ebbs sharp and bright,
Death follows his gloomy quest,
And sends his poisond lifeing darts
Into many a throbbing breast.

And this this world from end to end,
While fleeting Time shall be,
Is only a vast sepulchral tomb,
Where King Death regally
Relieves the woes of countless hearts,
Their years for sorrow.

Then pray for the dead, 'tis a wholesome thought,
As Christ Himself hath said—
To raise our souls in earnest prayer,
That God may bless the dead,
And give them heaven where angels fair,
Celestial fragrance shed.

AN ACCIDENTAL THOUGHT.

Lay two strings tightly on a separate board;
Then drawing near them whisper a clear word,
And in! the strings will vibrate with the sound;
Bearing so wandering warm sweet thrills around.
And so
A motion's voice, sometimes, though soft and low,
Vibrates 'twixt spirits—aliens though they be—
And down them sloun in Love's dear harmony!

THE ST. PATRICK'S CROSS.

Come, raise me up, alannah! Lift me up a little more,
And let the sunshine touch my bed, and stream upon the floor,
Draw back the curtain further yet—let enter every ray,
And gaze the place look cheerful, child! for this is St. Patrick's day.

Once more I bid it welcome—'tis the last for me I see,
I've had a long, long journey, but the end is drawing near;
Thank God, I've had my share of years, but, remember, child, to day,
My heart grows warm and youthful, and my thoughts are far away.

You know my old brown chest, mother; go now and find the key,
And bring me what you'll find there, in the bottom corner hid.
A little colored purple board [illegible]
And yet I prize it dearer far, next if I were sold or [illegible]

Long years ago I carried it across the rolling sea,
And There, with all its changes, has not stolen it from me;
Just as you read the other day—and I believe it true,
That everywhere an Irish gy, God's Cross will follow, too.

And there are friend around it, child, what you can't understand,
Old memories of other days—of youth, and manlier hand;
As dry and withered rose leaves speak of summer past and gone,
So Mic's bright early spring-time in this little cross lies on.

It is like one of the first time that I wore it, long ago,
Pinned here upon my shoulder, ah, but sure you'll never know
How proud I felt that morning, with my cross and ribbon green,
God and country bound together—I was prouder than a queen.

Here Sight and gay my spirits, as children should be light
Yet in four-leaved shamrocks whilst the dew drops sparkled still;
Whilst the blackbird sang its welcome, the primroses showed her face,
And violets nodded from their cozy hiding places.

My little cross—around you, oh, how many memories cling,
Old times, old scenes, old faces to my mind this holy day you bring;
Come, pin it on my shoulder, child, in spite of age or pain,
For Ireland and St. Patrick let me wear it once again.

The weight of years may bend me, but my soul shall ever pray,
May God be with the good old land, and bless her honored day,
And round the Cross entwine I may her shamrocks ever be seen,
That as she bore the burden she may share the triumph yet.

MY GRAVE.

There's a shadowy isle in a mystic sea,
Where I watch, and wait, and pray,
Its back, now calm, and now fierce the wave,
None visits the shadowy isle but one,
To weep where its white grave gleam.

I found this isle when Young Love died,
In the cold, dim, long-ago,
And I made her a grave and knelt by its side,
And my prayer, crushed heart in its anguish cried,
From the depth of a benedison was Again I come with the dust of pride,

To weep at a new made grave;
Ambition, too, I laid at her side,
For they drooped and pined when Young Love died,
For the light of life she gave.

And now my bark, with silent sail,
Wanders the mystic wave;
And I hoed not the breakline, and rock not the gale,
Nor the alien's sway, nor her victim's wail,
While I guard my island grave.

And a thousand fragments drift and float,
The wrecks of the wasted years;
But they pass adrift from the land of my boat,
And I hoed them not, as I dreamily float,
For my graves have happened my home.

The Penitent of Cortona.

A True Incident in the Life of St. Margaret.

Of the many saints whom the Church has placed upon her altars, there are few whose lives reflect so strikingly the power of the mercy and justice of God, than that of St. Margaret, the Penitent of Cortona—the Magdalen of the great Franciscan Order. In it we see the Justice of God evidently manifested by the terrible end of the wicked companion of Margaret's crime. His mercy, in not only raising Margaret from this vile creature she was to a height of sanctity seldom attained in this life, even by the purest souls, but in giving her such powerful graces as to enable her to be, to day, numbered among the Seraphim, while all the celestial choirs burn most ardently with Divine love.

Margaret was a native of Laviano in the diocese of Chiusi in the province of Tuscany. Her parents were of the well-to-do class. At the early age of seventeen she forsook the paths of virtue, and for more or ten years, like Magdalen, remained dead to a sense of her duty. At the end of this time an event occurred which proved the turning point of her career. One morning the companion of her evil course, the Lord of Montepulciano, left his villa on business but did not return that evening according to his promise. The next day passed and yet no tidings. On the third or fourth morning after his departure her little pet dog, which had accompanied him, returned alone, and going directly to where its mistress was, began to whine piteously and pull her robe, as if it wished her to go with it in search of something. Margaret, whose activities had been arrested by the unaccountable absence of her master, and astonished at the whining and unusual conduct of the little dog, immediately followed it to a heap of wood not far distant. But who will describe her horror when she found her murdered lover hidden under the pile, his carcass already in a state of corruption, a mass of worms and a prey to vermin. This was a terrible moment for poor Margaret. Contemplating the lamentable scene before her, and moved by an extraordinary grace of God she, on the instant, determined to change her life, and repair in as much as she could the scandals of her former career. In the first instance she gave unequivocal proofs of her conversion to the inhabitants of Montepulciano, and then like another prodigal she resolved to return to her father and humbly entreat his pardon. She instantly set out for Alt-Cortona. Arrived at her father's house she cast herself at his feet, and by her tears and sincere repentance obtained the paternal forgiveness.

Encouraged by her father's restored love and pardon, Margaret now set in earnest to do penance for her past follies. Every night her groans pierced the ebonds, and the words of bitter anguish she appealed to the saints in heaven to have if her and were yet in a state of damnation or if Jesus Christ would pardon her after the commission of such enormous crimes. At one time she fastened a cord round her neck, go bare foot like a criminal to the churches and public places, and with every sign of deep regret implore the pardon of the people she had once so scandalized. This conduct soon drew upon her the resentment of her mother who treated her as a fool, and so grieved over her father that he banished her for ever from his house. This was precisely what the demon wanted. Now was his opportunity to recover his lost prey. He vividly placed before her mind a long life of pleasure if she would but return to her former dissolute career and abandon the cold by this crushing temptation, she heard an interior voice which bade her repent of what the demon proposed. Margaret saw what the demon proposed. Margaret saw the danger, but trusting in God, she put from her the temptation, and resolved to do penance for her past sins. Her sorrow was so great, and her mortifications so severe, that in a short time she was the admiration of the whole city. Her fame reached the ears of the Pontiff, who sent for her to Rome, and after a long interview with her, gave her the habit of the Third Order of St. Francis. In obedience to that Pontiff's injunction she hastened to Cortona, and there set herself in the feet of one of the Fathers, made a general confession of all her sins, and received the habit of the Third Order as she had been commanded. The Fathers, however, prudently deferred according to her request till she had given solid proofs of a real conversion. Day by day her anxiety to receive the habit of penance grew more and more intense, and for three whole years she almost daily renewed her petition. At last her prayers were heard, and to her great consolation she was numbered among the children of the great Patriarch of the poor.

Margaret now continued her penances with great earnestness and fervor. But were I, dear reader, to recount all her heroic deeds, I have great doubts if you would believe me. So great and so rapid were her meditations that we could not conceive even a strong man practicing them on a body inured to suffering, much less delicate woman inflicting them on a body all lately treated with every tenderness and delicacy. After twenty, which was the cause of her fall, she tried to destroy by torture her face with stones and rubbing it with sharp gravel, every inch of her body was rendered livid by disciplines and other mortifications; her bed was the bare earth, her pillow a stone or a log of wood; and little by little she so accustomed herself to fasting that she reduced her daily nourishment to a little bread and water. This sort of life was more than the demon in whose power she once was, could silently endure. He tried every remedy in his power to shake her fervor, but in vain, for her Divine Spouse was ever at hand to aid and console her. At one time she was brought to the very verge of despair by the devil representing to her that her sins were too many and too great to be forgiven; that she would not persevere to the end; that God would sooner or later abandon her; and that she would be inevitably damned. Then in terror she threw herself at the feet of her crucifix, and in an agony exclaimed, "O my Jesus, I know that I do not deserve Thy pardon, or final perseverance, yet though You were to abandon me, and that damnation be my eternal portion, I will during my life shall acknowledge Your justice extolle Your mercies."

Seeing that remission for her was daily increasing, Margaret bewailed Our Lord to withdraw some external favors which elevated her in this estimation of men, but that Lord told her that it was His will to assist fast His gifts to her, this to encourage poor sinners to return to Him, and to promote His own glory, adding: "I have set thee up as a wonderful light to enlighten those who are seated in the shadow of sin. I have made thee an example for sinners, for a clear proof to them that if they do not reap My inspirations, and if, by the help of My grace, they fit themselves for the work of their justification, I am as ready to show mercy to them as to thyself. Hence I wish that all should know the graces I have showered thee, and that they may be published, not only in this country, but even beyond the seas." Some time before her death, Margaret was graving over the Passion of Christ, Our Lord appeared to her complaining of the ingratitude of Christians who daily crucify Him by their crimes. "As to thee, My child," He added, "who so least Me so often with bitter tears as I had forgotten thee, why dost thou not return to the from whence thou hast crucified Me so many times, if thou desirest so ardently to possess Me." As these last words grieved Margaret, He reassured her saying "Thou hast indeed crucified Me over and over again, but since thou hast been converted to Me and hast received the habit of the Third Order of My Father, My beloved Francis, and since thou hast given thyself to Me, I order, then that taken Me down from the Cross by the bitter sorrow of thy heart, and hast never replaced me there.

As Margaret and approached she increased her penances as much as the weakness of her body, after twenty three years of unremitting and very increasing austerities permitted. Her whole being became absorbed in the love of the Crucified. Long before her death, the day of her deliverance was revealed to her, and that a great number of souls delivered by her prayers and merits from the purifying flames of purgatory, would accompany her to Paradise. Margaret ended her mortal pilgrimage in her fifteenth year, and entered the celestial abode on the 22d of February, 1297. Her glorious and increasing power with God are testified by innumerable miracles, among which eight persons were raised to life at her tomb. Devotion to her spread with wonderful rapidity, and her feast began to be celebrated in various places; but it was not till 1728 that she was solemnly canonized by Pope Benedict XIII. Her feast is kept in the whole Franciscan Order with special solemnity on the anniversary of her death. Devotion to her has ever proved most effectual for the conversion of sinners, as our Lord told her the case would be—"Whatever thou shalt ask in My name shall be granted to thee, and those who have recourse to thee shall receive a special grace."

Considering then, the events of this wonderful penitent's life, and the extraordinary graces accorded her by the Giver of all good gifts, who will not, with submission, gratitude and love exclaim "Thy mercies, O Lord, I will sing forever!"

IRELAND A NATION.

Beautiful Sentiment from Daniel Dougherty.

Mr. Daniel Dougherty, in response to the toast, "Our Sister Isle," at a Celtic and Friendly Sons' dinner, New York, said: "It is a great pleasure to me to be present at this occasion. The countries of Continental Europe crowd each other, boundaries touch boundaries. Italy can surrender Savoy to France and still be Italy. Alsace and Lorraine may be torn from France, yet France remains one of the great Powers. Scotland and England are as one. God planted Ireland apart and alone, and—lade the wild waves of ocean roll around her shores for ever. Ireland is twice the distance from England that England is from France. Though speaking the same language, the Irish and English are as distinct from each other as the Frenchman from the German or the Italian from the Spaniard. Ireland, by the way, is nearer to America and the day set to us. Seven centuries of cruelty have not conquered the Irish. Try justice and they will be conciliated. Let England, by a magnificent act of policy that will win her the good will of the world, give peace to the counsels; let her duplicate Halifax, disarm Salisbury, resuscitate Gladstone, make bright and beautiful the sunset of his illustrious life by granting Home Rule, send Parnell to Dublin as Lord Lieutenant to open the Irish Parliament, and Ireland, with a spotless fame, and the acclamations of mankind, will take her seat and the family of nations.

European Liquor Statistics.

The Swiss bureau of statistics recently prepared a reliable report giving the annual liquor consumption of different countries, it showed that the people of the United States drank more of it than those of Denmark, Holland, Switzerland, Belgium, Germany, Sweden, Russia, France, Austria, Hungary, Great Britain and Ireland. The only countries where the average per head was less than the United States, were Italy, Finland and Canada. The average consumption of spirits in the United States is a little less than 5 quarts a year, while Germany is a trifle over 12 quarts, and in Ireland 24 quarts, in Germany 9 quarts, in Russia 8 quarts, and in France 7½ quarts. In the consumption of beer and malt liquors Germany comes first with an average per capita of 150 quarts a year, England is second with an average of 145 quarts, while the United States comes fourth with an average per capita of 22 quarts. France is, of course, conspicuous for its wine-drinking. The average per capita in that country is placed at 40 quarts, Switzerland is second with an average of 37 quarts. The United States is sixth with an average of 25 quarts. The figures of the United States however, compare agreeably with those of Great Britain.

Good St. Anthony.

The Catholic Universe reports cases of how St. Anthony helps to find lost things. Just try the good Saint's intercession yourself, whenever you lose something you really want to find. St. Anthony will bring it to you as sure as you live. The other day Orlando Wood, Secretary of the Society of I. C. B. U., of Alexandria, Va., wrote us he had lost the check of $75 we had sent him for the Library Fund. He wanted another check and the lost one stopped at the bank. We gave no other check. We gave no notice to stop the lost one. We gave him little by little as he accustomed himself to fasting that she reduced her daily nourishment to a little bread and water. This sort of life was more than the demon in whose power she once was, could silently endure. He tried every remedy in his power to shake her fervor, but in vain, for her Divine Spouse was ever at hand to aid and console her. At one time she was brought to the very verge of despair by the devil representing to her that her sins were too many and too great to be forgiven; that she would not persevere to the end; that God would sooner or later abandon her; and that she would be inevitably damned. BLACK BAPTISTS BAPTIZED.

Religious Scenes and Queer Songs.

On the banks of the pond, between the road and the water, the polyanthuses are ranged three or four deep, and down at the lower corner, near where the millrace debouches from the end of the dam, I used to think to be pleasant this warm August day. For this is the centre of attraction. Here are the dressing rooms overshadowed by several large trees, and leading a long way down into the water, are two planks upon which the candidates for baptism enter and leave the water.

All colors of skin are represented among the crowd, from the almost white cream faces of some of the undaties to the ebony black of the real old fashioned, "born" de wah Affrica. And all colors of the rainbow flash and rustle and flutter in the sunshine as the wind stirs the garments of the female portion of the brethren. Such has on her Sunday-go-to-meeting ribbons, and marvellous indeed are some of the combinations of color and arrangement of the ribbons.

But a stir in the crowd announces the arrival of the preachers, and they unfeelingly give greetings around as they make their way to their dressing room to don their water garments. Two of them enter the water at the side out of the home plate, marked by a stake, where the water is about waist deep. Both of them are pretty dark in color, self satisfied in manner, and of that sleek appearance and round outline of form that are the usual appanage of popular negro preachers, for the fattest chicken is the good pullet, the lightest biscuits are too heavy, and the oldest buttermilk is too warm for them when they pushed the glasses of their tempers on Brother M. or Sister A. at dinner after the monthly morning preaching. Verily they live on the fat of the land and their shadows never grow lean.

Some of the converts emerge from the dressing room and stand in the shallows at the edge of the pond, accompanied by old sisters and sisters, and this is the signal for singing to commence.

A short, stubby, bull dozen, whose countenance is about that of a Sergeant, starts the tune

"Oh, what you gwine, mourner?
What you gwine, I say?
Oh, I gwine wah de river of Jordan,
You cannot cross to-day.

Sing, brethren, de good Lord bears you,
What you gwine, I say?
Oh, I gwine down de river of Jordan,
You cannot cross to-day.

The first verse, accompanied by a couple of deacons, enters the water and wades out to where the preachers await her coming. She is quiet and serious and makes no demonstration as she comes out, extremism being not yet get the hold on the crowd that it will have later on.

The leader of the hank gives out the next song. Several more go through quietly, but the song is getting louder and a decided movement of the singers, led by the deacon, who is getting worked up to fever heat, is noticed. The extremist Sister Gladstone, makes a decided advance, containing, as it undeniably does, more of the spirit of the Spirit than Sister Gladstone's. The leader of the hank gives out the following:

"Ole Satan's a-ridin' on a cloud,
Ole Satan's a-ridin' on a cloud,
Ole Satan's a-ridin' on a cloud,
Ole Satan's a-ridin' on a cloud.

Excitement is getting a good hold on the crowd now, and many of the newly baptized are receiving the congratulations of their friends receiving congratulations. One old sister is overcome with joy and excitement, and is embracing everybody who will submit to her in that way. In her hour of salutation she is actually approaching a young, and, judging by her companion, who is standing close by, very handsome, young man. Her friends are laughing at her, and a good deal of fun is being made of her attempts to get her arms about a young man.

Now the preacher, who is a tall, lean, bony man, who is a good deal of a dandy, and who is evidently a man of some education, and who is the Sergeant Bull Dozen's superior in every respect, takes the hank and sings:

"Ole Satan's a-ridin' on a cloud,
Ole Satan's a-ridin' on a cloud,
Ole Satan's a-ridin' on a cloud,
Ole Satan's a-ridin' on a cloud.

The words are spoken, he is drawn slid under the water by the practised hands of the preachers, and as he comes up a baptized sister leads the neighborhood knew it, "I've found him, I've found him; bless de Lawd," and waving his hands and splashing the water all around he stands and shouts until the attendants lead him ashore.

Time is slipping away, so the officers don't let the water stay long. Some more go down into the water, and, one by one, come out to their shouting on the pond.

There is a sweet rhythmical ring to the best tunes that never fails to carry a number of hundred of negro voices joining in the old song.

In de sweet dello di Elias,
In de sweet dello di Elias,
In de sweet dello di Elias,
Dat's the time for me.

CATHOLIC NEWS NOTES.

Church Concerns in Many Countries.

—Thomas a Kempis has been translated into the Siamese language by a Protestant Missionary.

—The enterprising and pushing Catholics of St. Louis will erect the finest Catholic church in the United States, if good old Liberius.

—Rt. Rev. Bishop Rademacher of Green Bay, expects to start for Rome about April 20th, accompanied by Rev. Joseph A. Zemmger, Chancellor of Milwaukee Archdiocese.

—The plans for the new Catholic school house, in Boston, Eng., are now prepared. The building will be an ornament to that town and will cost about $70,000.

—The Sisters of Loretto, Loretto Heights, Pa., visited St. Louis, Mo., towards the close of Lent. Father Lambert has been pastor of Fort Hodge for seventeen years.

—At 88 Peter and Paul's Church, Detroit, a very successful retreat for men was given lately by Fathers Bradley and Finnegan, S. J.

—The health of Bishop Wiggers of Newark is said to have improved little since he went to Temperary seclusion at Seton Hall, South Orange, N. J. His stay there is for the purpose of obtaining a complete rest from diocesan labors.

—Very Rev. Geo. L. Willard, of the Catholic Indian Bureau, Washington, and Father Ketcham, Jasper Co., Ind., where he left his mission for a time to superintending the erection of an Indian in such a church, have left for Rome.

—The many friends of Father Felix Barry, of Washington, will be pained to learn that they were struck down in his office while ministering to the hospital at Vinna de Mar, near Valparaiso. The latest cable dispatches announce their convalescence.

—Catholics of Ulster, Bishop Dorrian, Prince Edward Island, in his will gave forty thousand dollars to Bishop McIntyre for the erection of the Catholic College, and left the testator's relatives penniless. Irish Catholics, take a lesson from Scotch.

—Rev. William B. Hunter, of Carbondale, is travelling in the Western States in Sunday City, Mo., at the Church of St. John, Rev. James Fielden, pastor, Father Hunter celebrated a Solemn Mass of Requiem for the repose of the late Bishop of Kilkenny and Leighlin, an honoring attribute venerable Prelate's decease.

—Pere Dulac, one of the most distinguished Dominicans of France, is now living in retirement at Flavigny, in the old convent of Flavigny, which he has made the mother house of the Dominicans of the Holy Ghost. Pere Dulac is a nephew of Mgr. Dulac, the Vicar Apostolic of Dakota, and a brother of Bishop Dulac's assistant, Father Dulac.

—Pope Leo XIII. has conferred the Papal Medal on Mr. Thomas Gallagher, of Ottawa, Ont., for his generous services to the Church in Canada. Mr. Gallagher has been the generous and zealous friend of the Oblate Fathers, and is universally esteemed for his charitable disposition and his great zeal for the cause of the Church.

—Mother Mary Johnson, for thirteen years superior of the Sisters of St. Joseph in Phila delphia, died on Tuesday, March 27, in St. Joseph's Academy and Convent, at Chestnut Hill, near Philadelphia. Mother Johnson was a native of Armagh, Ireland. She entered the Sisterhood of St. Joseph in 1851 under her brothers, the late Rev. T. Kearney, of St. Mark's Church, Port Richmond, Philadelphia, and the late Rev. Jas. Kearney, of St. Joseph's Church, Germantown, Philadelphia, entered the priest hood, and of her sisters, one became a member of the Sisters of the Immaculate Heart, and the other, Sister Ignatius, was for a number of years Superior of the Order of St. Joseph.

—Cardinal Manning's articles on the social question have been attracting special attention in the Catholic press abroad. In one of them he says that the remedy is pointed out by the Vicomte de Vesnole, whilst in another article of very similar character he appears in the Moniteur de Rome. The leading German Catholic organ, Germania, calls his Eminence's action in this question "a new service rendered by the great English Prince of the Church, upon whom the German Catholics look with joyful veneration and the deepest reverence; and that service is one on behalf of the poor and needy, whose cause has so often been taken in hand by Cardinal Manning.

—Archbishop Ryan, of Philadelphia, who celebrated his golden jubilee last Lent, is in excellent health. In conversation with a representative of the Ledger, he said he remarked that America and American affairs were dwelling on his mind at the time of the Vatican. "Does the Pope know asked the reporter, "what is going on in this far distant country in Church and other affairs?" "Yes," said Archbishop Ryan, "the Pope is conversant with American affairs. He knows the first time that his Holiness has seen a copy of the Constitution of the United States?" "No, indeed, the Pope has never seen it. It is the most convenient form for carrying and taking, and is the most popular. Formerly they were made by hand. The Latin Vulgate was the Latin Bible. There are a few manufacturers who make 1,000,000 pils a week.

Saved the Frame.

A well-known showman who owns ran a menagerie in a Pennsylvania town tells a story which will amuse the printers. He hired a big colored person to take the tickets from the 1 ffice, and he carefully directed him to move a "form" from one place to another. The early promptly put in on his hand, and just as promptly his head went through, and there was a terrible mess of "ink." To his employer he then reported: "Boss, I done spilled the type, but I saved the frame."

—A Roman correspondent contradicts the report that the Pope is suffering from Cholera. His Holiness is quite strong, and will sing Mass at St. Peter's today at the 11th hour, for the Croatian pilgrims.

A Life Well Spent.

There has just died at Verne, France, of which place he has been Cure since 1832, an old priest by the name of Fidlete, who drew up the night before his death, a memorandum setting forth that during his ministry in Verne alone he had baptized 1,526 infants, assisted at 1,326 deaths, celebrated 300 marriages, and had heard 25,000 confessions. At the foot of his memoranda he wrote, "God has been very good."

—Post mortem examinations are to be asked for publication soon to just for to advance a project by the name of Fidlete, who drew up the night before his death, a memorandum setting forth that during his ministry in Verne alone he had baptized 1,526 infants, assisted at 1,326 deaths, celebrated 300 marriages, and had heard 25,000 confessions. IN THE HOLY LAND.

Sisters of Charity Among Lepers.

Our excellent contemporary Les Missions Catholiques, gives a graphic description of the actual condition of lepers in the Holy Land, as well as the efficacious and wonderful kind care of those solely effected persons, in reading the letter of Mgr. Dupuis, who has been for many years an eye witness of what he describes, we must confess that the Sisters of Charity have surpassed all expectations in the temporal and spiritual care lavished on the unfortunate victims of the leper. The results will but fill most Christian hearts with joy and gratitude. Mgr. Dupuis writes that during the last year of 1886 arrivals. The results will but fill most Christian hearts with joy and gratitude. Mgr. Dupuis writes that during the last year of 1886 arrivals. The Indian lepers seems so little to have been changed or improved upon. Even the tribes of Moses and of Christ, the leper is today cut off from human society, or at least restricted to the companionship of those who share in his affliction. Formerly, we are told by Mgr. Pelet, the lepers of Jerusalem were permitted to live in a time-honoured hospital situated in a secluded part of the Holy City. About twelve years ago, however, those unhealthy buildings were torn down and their inmates transferred to a secluded valley of Cedron, beyond the walls of Hr Ayoub, or Nehemiah. Here they form a village and a community of their own. They are secluded as far as possible from the great world without, and are cared for with the tender sympathy only female companionship is sufficient to impart.

Lately, however, the spirit of Christian charity has given them a more commodious and pleasant retreat. Their sates are largely supplied by loving and generous hands, and the sweet sisters of charity are at their side to minister to their wants. The lepers are also provided with a new hospital, which is one of the most beautiful and comfortable of the kind. The lepers are also provided with medicine and in some generally. Speaking, of course, only as lepers, we may say that we shall look with much interest for further accounts of the loving care lavished on lepers and other maladies.

"CAPTAIN JACK."

A Touching Tribute to Sisters of Charity.

While at Phœnix, Arizona, some time ago, I had the pleasure of listening to a lecture by Captain Jack Crawford, the poet scout, and the hero of many an exciting adventure while engaged in his dangerous calling, that of a thoroughly secret in the Indian country. The hall was represented to be almost capacity and when the scout stepped upon the stage the applause was all most deafening. Every one in the house knew and admired the Captain, and as he stood there dressed in his buckskin garb his long hair falling in wavy folds over his broad shoulders, and his keen eyes sweeping over the audience, I thought I had never seen a more noble specimen of athletic manhood.

He began his "Campfire talk" as he called it, with a brief sketch of his adventures during the war, in which he served in the 8th Pennsylvania Infantry. At the battle of Spotsylvania he was severely wounded and sent to the Satterlee Hospital, at Philadelphia. When he reached that place he was in a condition his voice grew soft as he paid this tribute to the noble Sisters of Charity:

"While lying upon a cot in the hospital, battling with pain with all my boyish strength, when the doctors said I could not live, and when I could almost feel the icy kiss of death upon my brow, I looked up and saw a sister of charity, a black robed sister of charity, kindly my cot of pain and prayed and watched with the angels in white. By her careful nursing that good Sister saved my life. And now, after all the years of peace, when I entered the array I could not write my poem, I could not do justice to it, nor do it the honor it deserves, I could do it but little justice to the noble, the grand Sister of Charity, that noble, that grand woman, the deepest veneration, coupled with affection and admiration, I have for her, and the same reverence from time to time repeated to my children, that they may know, I trust, that I have built the shrine of her memory in my heart.

"Ye all that's green and beautiful earth there are some of you, I know, who have sisters, and I know Mr. Hunter, that you have sisters, and I know that you have sisters, and I know that you have sisters, and I know

EDITORIAL NOTES.

—Mrs. Margaret Hughes Hodrigue, sister of the lamented Archbishop Hughes of New York, died recently in New York and was buried from St. Patrick's Cathedral.

—Ten carloads of Mexicans, a total of 360 persons, on a pilgrimage from the City of Mexico to Rome, passed through El Paso last Wednesday. Archbishop Padallo, the highest Catholic official in Mexico, leads the party.

—The transatlantic steamship companies are stopping the booking of Irish emigrants, because the number of applicants for passage is greater than can be accommodated. Shiel is the "happy conditions" of the Irish people under English legislation!

—The City of Washington subscribed $150,000 towards the erection of the Catholic University. If every city in the Union gives in proportion there will be no trouble in completing the buildings during next year.

—It is stated that Cardinal Howard, cousin of the Duke of Norfolk and the Senior English-speaking Cardinal, who has been in ill-health for a long time, is now temporarily insane and has been taken to a private asylum at Prague, a school of Facts.

—Miss Dora Grant, a near relative of the late General Grant, was received into the Church by the Very Rev. Father Waters-Russell, C. P., on the feast of St. Joseph, in the Church of the English Passionists, Avenue Hoche, Paris.

—The latest and most ridiculous rumor from Rome is to the effect that Archbishop Walsh is to be made a Cardinal and given a permanent position in Rome and Archbishop Persico made head of the Irish Church. When that happens the Hill of Howth will fill up the Gap of Dunloe.

—We present our readers this week with the concluding portions of Father Adam's remarkably interesting letter from Egypt, and we are happy to say that we have just received another very interesting epistle from our valued friend, which will run through our columns for the ensuing two weeks.

—High buildings having been erected adjacent to the gardens in which the Holy Father takes his daily walks, it has been found necessary to erect a canopy covering the gardens to an additional height to the influence of a disease which was caused by the prying eyes of the curious who sometimes hurl insulting remarks at him.

—A New York Commissioner of Immigration very sensibly says that Mormons come under the head of assisted immigrants and should not be permitted to land. His position has turned Mormon immigration to the right of thinking, this incoming tide of prosperitive Mormon polygamists might be checked.

—In his very remarkable speech in the Canadian House of Commons last month, Sir Richard Cartwright showed by incontestable statistics that during the last twenty-five years Canada has lost to the United States 2,900,000 of its population, which at present is only about 4,600,000, as against 61,000,000. Canada has not even retained the natural increase of its population.

—"C. L." must excuse us from answering any more of his minimizing objections concerning the Catholic Church. When a non-Catholic says that he takes the evidence of St. Augustine in favor of the Catholic Church "for what it is worth," it is useless to strive to convince him of Catholic truth. Let "C. L." present Cardinal Gibbons' Faith of our Fathers, and he will find much therein to enlighten him.

—The beatification of Blessed Clementi Marie Hofbauer will be solemnly kept in Rome on the 27th, 28th, and 29th of this month, and among the clergymen to be present at the ceremonies will be a deputation of American priests to represent the Redemptorist Order in the United States. They are the Rev. Elias F. Schaer, C. SS. R., Provincial of Baltimore, Md.; the Rev. Wm. Lowekamp, C. SS. R., Provincial of St. Louis, Mo.; the Rev. William Waytich, C. SS. R., and the Rev. Peter J. Schauer. All of them are now on their way to Rome.

—Father Rivington, a member of the great English publishing family, and one of the most familiar figures in the ultra ritualistic circles of Oxford a dozen years ago, has just been received into the Catholic Church. He is an attractive preacher and has been a successful missionary in India, but has most recently been preaching in the English Church at San Remo, where the Empress Victoria was a constant attendant. His secession from the Episcopalian sect on the subject of much sentiment all through Great Britain.

—A leading London paper says that one of the greatest anxieties awaiting the new German Emperor, is the probable conversion of his mother, at no very remote date, to Catholicism. The Monitore de Roma declares in no many words that it is the intention of the Empress Augusta to become a Catholic, and that after her reception she will definitely leave Germany and spend the remainder of her life in Florence. It is not impossible that this announcement may be put forth as a feeler, but it will surprise no one who is acquainted with the strong Catholic sympathy of the Empress, in whom, throughout the bitter struggle of the Kulturkampf the Pope and the German Bishops always knew they had a powerful ally at the Imperial Court. Her conduct to the Old Catholic Bishop Reinkens when he was presented at Court, was a matter of severe criticism at the time, and her dislike of Old Catholicism was notorious. There is an impression in some parts of Germany that she has long been a Catholic."

Christian Heroism Exemplified.

A telegram from Oregon brings the intelligence of an act of self-sacrifice which truly illustrates the Divine power of Catholic faith. Rev. L. L. Conrardy, a zealous Belgian priest, has been for many years engaged in missionary work among the Oregon Indian tribes congregated on the Umatilla Reservation, where he has truly led a them-crowned life of self-abnegation worthy of an Apostle of the true Faith.

Father Conrardy recently learned that Father Damien, the heroic priest who died at present laboring among the leper colony on the Island of Molokai, had contracted leprosy, the disease having settled in his hands, which will soon disgustfully him from breaking the "Bread of Life" to this poor stricken souls that form his flock. Sooner than see Christ's newly-afflicted sufferers deprived of a spiritual Shepherd, Father Conrardy at once wrote to Archbishop Gross for leave to resign his present mission in order to devote the rest of his life to the service of God in saving the souls of the poor exiled lepers upon Molokai, Sandwich Islands!

Such an act on the part of a Catholic priest, proclaims in thunder tones the power of Divine Faith on the soul that is saturated with the grace of God. Father Conrardy well knows that he must now bind up his self for his natural life from all civilized society, but also that he is certain to contract a most loathsome and repulsive disease which is sure to end in a slow death, yet for the sake of saving souls that might otherwise be lost, this true priest of God volunteers to become the servant of servants to a community who are looked upon with loathing by those who live in the world and for the world alone!

What shallow shams sectarian preachers become when compared to Catholic priests under such circumstances! True faith alone can inspire man with the supernatural heroism to take their lives in their hands and to live amongst epidemic, contagion and death in order to secure the salvation of souls just as dear to Almighty God as the soul of the most favored among Fortune's friends.

Where, in all the world, is there a Protestant preacher who would have the courage to carry the Cross up the Calvary of life which Father Conrardy has voluntarily chosen! And yet, these feather-bed "missionaries" never tire of telling their misguided flocks that the Catholic Church is not the religion of Christ! Our Lord promised to be with His Church all days even to the end of time, and this personal sacrifices which Catholic missionaries make in God's service and solely for His glory—prove that He dwells in the Catholic Church still!

Father Damien has already succumbed to the influence of a disease arising from the prying eyes of the curious who sometimes hurl insulting remarks at him.

Recent Beatifications in Rome.

During the past month many Servants of God have been raised to Beatification by the Holy Father. Among them were Jean de Beauignon, Sister Joseph Marie of St. Agnes, Professed Nun of the Order of Perpetual Hermits of St. Augustine, which took place, with the ceremonies of rite, in the Church of the Sacred Heart of Jesus of the Vestine Mass of Confessors, with customes proper, being the titular Bishop of Valentinia, assisted by the Vicar Urban Chapter.

The Sacred Congregation of Rites has also passed upon the Causes of the Beatification of the Venerable Bartholomeo Capitanio, First Foundress of the Sisters of Charity in Lovere, near Brescia, Pontente, Cardinal Parocchi, of Venerable Hieronzo Lanfranzi, Novice of the Congregation of Regular Poor Clerks of the Mother of God, Pontente, Cardinal Bianchi; and that of Venerable Margaret Duffaud de Lajemmarine, of Lourdie, Widow, Foundress of the Sisters of Charity in Marmiquhia, Pontente, Cardinal Martinelli. Six other Causes await merely definite sentence relative to the authenticity of miracles wrought under the intercession of the candidates for Beatification, Venerable Father Avila, Spanish, Venerable Grace, of the Century, Venerable Perboyre, of the Congregation of the Mission; Venerable Antonia, Bishop of Salonge, of the Century; Venerable Chanel, Marist, martyred in Oceania, and Venerable Pirrotti, of the Pious Schools, whose respective Beatifications will, it is hoped, take place before the close of this Jubilee year. Among other Causes under consideration before the Sacred Congregation of Rites, is that of the Venerable Julia Billiart, Foundress of the Institute of the Sisters of Notre Dame, of Namur, in whose name the Rev. Mother General made a Jubilee offering through the Postulator of the Cause of a valuable Episcopal ring, with an immense diamond of purest water; that of the Venerable Mother Alice Clere, Foundress of the Congregation of Notre Dame, whose process of Beatification was recently brought to Rome by Count Gandolfi, together with a superb chalice, a pen in gold, and other Jubilee gifts, in the name of the said Congregation; that of the Venerable Francis Libermann, a converted Jew, Founder of the Congregation of the Holy Ghost and of the Sacred Heart of Mary, who directs the French Seminary in Rome.

It is computed that two hundred and thirty-five Saints have been inscribed in the Calendar of the Church since the canonization of St. Ubbertus by Pope John XXII., in his Decalo Extraordinaria, in 1921, of whom forty-eight were added during the nineteenth century.

Ireland's Decadence.

One of the most striking cartoons which have recently come under our notice was that issued on St. Patrick's Day Supplement to the Dublin Freeman's Journal. It represents Erin standing on the seashore, pointing across the broad Atlantic Ocean, on which is engraved "In painful measure of 2,500,000 Irishmen and Irishwomen, who died of hardship and starvation, and emigrated to America, during the decade ending 1881." Erin's face is turned towards the spectator, leaning against a stern-looking Celtic Cross, on which is engraved "Year of Famine, 1847." Her Hints For the Housewife.

Don't allow matches to be kept loose or in paper boxes, but only in metal or earthen jars. Those lighting on the box only are safest.

Don't allow any loose jointed and creaky stairs on your premises, which could be swept without write screws, or gloves, if light materials or curtains are near them.

It takes more than twice as much sugar to sweeten preserves, sauce, etc., if put in when they begin to cook, than it does to sweeten after the fruit is cooked. This is because some sugar turns to grape sugar by cooking and thus loses its sweetening power.

To cure a felon take a half-cup of common pitch tar in a tin dipper, set it on the stove and stir with the affected finger as long as you can bear the heat. Then remove to cool and heat again, keeping it in half an hour at a time, three or four times a day for three days.

Do not put the knife blades into boiling water, as the heat of the metal may cause the shank to expand and crack the handle. Set the knife blades down, in a little pipe shaw with warm water until you are ready to wash and dry them. After drying the blades rub on a little powdered rottenstone, moistened with a paste by a few drops of water, and polish with a clean cloth. In this way they will not wear cutting every day on a board or in a machine, both of which process is sure the blades very much.

A correspondent writes to the New York Tribune: To inform the poor mothers whose children are suffering for want of milk that in France even the children of many rich people are half fed on Barley-water. It is considered most nourishing and is recommended by doctors for delicate babies, and thought much better than cow's milk. The barley itself can be used in broth for older children, and is all the better for being so thoroughly boiled.

Choice Cooking Receipts.

SCALLOPED CORNED.—Mix together two teacupfuls of mashed potatoes, one and a half teacupfuls of cold boiled codfish, two and a half teacupfuls of milk, one half egg, and one quarter of a teacupful of butter; bake a light brown.

USE OF SALT.—Salt is preservative in its nature. If too much of it is used in cooking it wars against the juice of the stomach and thus retards digestion, and it will in time derange the digestive organs. It is best to use it in small quantities.

SWEET TEASTS ORANGE.—During unhealthy seasons, when diphtheria and like contagious diseases prevail, eaten ought to be eaten at least once a week. Onions are invigorating and prophylactic beyond description.

TO UNFIXE STALE BREAD.—Cut all the crust from a loaf of stale bread, and then tear the loaf in long thin pieces. Spread them in a large pan, only one layer deep, and place in a hot oven. When they are crisp and brown, which will be in six or seven minutes if the oven is very hot, send them to the table with thin slices of cheese. This dish is nice just before dessert. Frequently it is served with the coffee.

WHITE BEAN SOUP.—Soak one quart of beans over night, drain off the water, put the beans in the stock pot with one carrot, one onion, one tablespoonful of prepared seasoning, three quarts of water. Let them simmer four hours; and then strain through a colander, stirring it over the stove, and remove the scum boiling. When finished add a pat of good butter, a little sugar and a little chopped parsley. Serve with fried crust of bread.

TO REMOVE ALPACA AND MOHAIR.—Brush the material, if alpaca, perfectly clean and free from dust; then sponge the right side with clear, cold coffee which has been strained through a piece of black calico or muslin; to kill of black moulds is better than a sponge to dampen with) and iron with a hot iron immediately on the wrong side; it will "look good as new." Black merino can be restored by the same process. To save time do not rip dresses to be made over, but cut close to the seams in skirt and overskirt, leaving whole the lining, unless desired otherwise.

Value of Silence.

What a strange power is silence! How many resolutions are formed—how many sublime exposets effected—during that pause when the lips are closed, and the soul security feels the Eye of her Maker upon her!

When some of those cutting, sharp, biting words have been spoken, which send the hot, indignant blood to the face and head; if those to whom they are addressed keep silence, look with awe—for a mighty work is going on within them, and the spirit of evil and their guardian angel, is very near to them in that hour—during that pause they have made a step towards heaven or towards hell, and an item has been recorded in the Book, which the Day of Judgment will see opened.

They are the strong ones who know how to keep silence when it is hard to utter a word of reply to them—those who give time to their ever scale to war strong against temptation, or to the powers of wrath to stamp upon their power.

The Real Friend.

The truth is, friendship is a romance that has been written and spoken a thousand times among men, but never spoken unless in a dramatic way. Thus was prepetually to be saved from our friends, and we say that a man who has many acquaintances and few friends is at one the happiest and saf-est of mankind. There have hardly been a dozen friendships since the time of Jonathan and David, which could bear the weight of an awkward looking circumstance, or a decently alloted report. A friendship at its height, is the favor of its favor fit, what is it hairypressy? Our friends think themselves gods, not men, and as their instruments, the profitable implements of their feature, their embrace and of their will. Friendship is not connected by a sacrament, as marriage is, yet we must have a friend. We shrink from unfriended solitude. But there is no true friend but God.

All Have Their Crosses.

Things are very well balanced in this world as far as taking comfort goes, and we begin to believe that high or low, all have their tribulation. Fishes are hooked, worms are trodden on, birds are fired at. Worry is everywhere. Poor mare' wives worry because the stove won't draw, or the chicken line breaks, or the mill burns, or the pane of glass is mended with putty, or their neighbor's afflicted to hire help. Rich mens' wives worry because the dish is not of the latest pattern, or because some body finds out how a party dress is trimmed before the party happens, or because some grandma's wife overlooks them. Canoes very, but the worry arranges about the same. The ends of miles are different on different maps, but places remain just so far apart, and so do Humanity and Content.

Family Fun.

Burglars in the House.

It is not pleasant—we have it on the very best authority—to be awakened in the middle of a cold night with an intimation from the wife of your best bosom that "there are thieves in the house," and that "if you don't go down stairs and parley with them we shall all be murdered in our beds."

It is trying by reason of the cold.

It is yet more trying from the unusual terms on which the dwellers in the house, in the short shirt, and pattering on the icy oilcloth, condemn supplicants.

So we can hardly blame little Tommy kin if he did not spring out of bed with alacrity when assured "There's as many as a dozen down there, if I think rightly, and they hear Tompkins listened. There was profound quiet. In the act of listening he fell asleep. But not so his wife.

"There! don't you hear that! she demanded. "And Aunt Sarah's silver teapot's down there, and the children's new frocks, and the best carrisen. Oh, why—why don't you go down!"

"But what in the use!" he remonstrated.

"The use!"

"Yes; they'd better take Aunt Sarah's teapot than my—"

"Frederick, you're a coward."

"No, Amanda; I'm not afraid but there is no cross in my going down. Suppose one of them should be lying behind the door at the dead of the kitchen stairs, and I attempted to pass, should knock my brains out! There's no end of my good down so, Amanda," he went on "they must have a gun. I don't hear them."

"There's that noise again. Now, Fred, if you don't go, I shall go and tell the neighbors that a nice coward you are. Will you go?" I shall yelled Mrs. Tompkins.

"I'll go Sakes! I ma kim the baby, for I shall never see's again. In ten minutes I shall be a corpse."

But she was inexorable. So he was nothing to do but comply; but he did not go with his a struggle.

"Amanda," he said, as he stood shivering, his teeth chattering the while, "we've been married nearly five years. Haven't I always been a good husband to you? haven't I bought you new bonnet, real skin jackets, and high-heeled boots? And now you would have me go down there to be murdered, I say, most foully; yes, slain in the most horrible manner—struck on the head with the kitchen poker and knocked one quarter, thrust out from ear to ear, eyes blooded with caper—pepper and then stabbed to death. Farewell. I forgive you. Tell the baby boy, when he grows up, that his father loved him and that he died brave-ly. Knowing a set of murderers were in the house, he got out of bed, went downstairs, and defiantly faced them, was overpowered, and killed. I don't care—I feel" she shrieked, "you go and find out what's the matter.

"Well, I'll go," said the almost fainting man, as he moved towards the stairs, shaking and quaking with fear.

Slowly he descended to the hall and lit the gas therein—shuddered—dared another flight—cautiously opened the kitchen door and what did he behold! Only the cat playing with an India rubber ball!

And such is life in the mustrial development.

A Narrow Escape.

It was at a wedding. The guests filed slowly through the room where the presents were displayed, and each gazed with wonder and admiration on the one that lay above them all.

"How good of him!

"Oh, father, how could you!" said the bride as she saw it and fell blushing on his neck.

"Never mind," he said, in choked accents, "you deserve it."

Three hours later when all was still and the room deserted, he crept in his slippers, drawing short quick breaths as he approached the wonderful gift. Then he clutched it, crumpled it in his anger across grooves and threw it in the stove.

"Saved!" he gasped. "Saved from beggary and ruin! And he went back to bed. It was an order for a ton of coal.

Little Laughlets.

A curious anecdote has been told of the Emperor William of Germany. An artist was commanded to paint some court ceremony and brought some sketches to the Emperor. Instead, however, of representing the Crown Prince standing upright by his father's side, the painter had sketched him with one foot on the step of the throne on which the Emperor was seated. His Majesty at once seized a pencil, scratched out the obnoxious foot and drew it in its proper place, writing on the margin, "Not yet!"

Wife—"And you won't give me the price of an Easter bonnet?"

Husband—"No."

Wife (with a sob)—"You are one of the meanest of men, one of the smallest—"

II. (accentually)—"You are a lady and a model wife."

W. (with dignity)—"I know it, sir. The opinion is universally held that I is the greatest man get the best wife."

II. (laughing)—"By Jove. That's worth a bonnet! Here, take my pocketbook and help yourself."

W. (in smiles and tears)—"I always knew you were a dear."

Magistrate, to witness—"Do you know the nature of an oath, Uncle Ramus?"

Uncle Ramus—"I reckon I does yo' Honah. Ise owsed a balky mule fo' fouteen yu."

Tramp—Can you let me have a nickel, sir!

"Well I'd like to help you a lot, but I have been imposed on so often by worthless characters that I must be cautious. What brought you to this deplorable condition?"

"I was editor of a society paper and—"

"Here's a dollar. Go and eat something."

SCOTT'S EMULSION of Pure Cod Liver Oil, with Hypophosphites is a combination of two of the most valuable remedies in existence for the cure of Consumption and all Wasting Conditions; it is more generally recommended and used by Physicians than any known remedy; it gives most satisfactory results, and tones up the system; and when the Consumptive has wasted away and lose hope, the Emulsion will speedily check the ravages of this terrible disease, and restore the sufferer to good health and happiness. This is equally true in regard to Rickets in Children, or Marasmus and Anæmia in Adults, and all impoverished conditions of the blood; and especially desirable for Colds and Chronic Coughs, as it will cose them more quickly than ordinary Specifics used. Palatable as milk.

NEWS FROM IRELAND.

Catholic Affairs on the Camstock.

VIRGINIA CITY, April 15th, 1888.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR—

Dear Sir—The Comstock Branch of the Irish National League established by the eloquent O'Connor and Grattan Ramsdell is the entity of the Catholic population of Nevada, much in silver and gold, the Catholic population is not exploiting the pride of birthright of Ireland. In embracing the poor banished of the land and heartest citizens of the prosperous community, who seem thoroughly antichristic for the cause. Even amongst one census of Virginia's talented young ladies appear on the roll, and when a cause can number among its adherents and supporters so many fair ladies, it is sure to accept the golden chaff of success. Hon. J. F. Egan, President of the League, being and the popular Financier Treasurer Capt. P. J. Duane, Secretary, the sum of $500, Joseph O. Regan, Assistant Secretary, the sum of $500. This will enable the Land Leaguers to carry on the good work, and comfort the victims of the landlordly brutal Balfour has vented his hell on base, by a system of persecution and murder, as inhuman, unequalled in savage or by any tyrant. Now that the long-suffering Irish people are determined to battle peacefully, unflinching and everlastingly for the downtrod and destitute of the democratic Government that now holds sway in Albion's dominions, all liberty-loving people, the world over, should see that they are sustained and encouraged in this long and hard-fought contest. The League fairly, and will continue to do so, in the Old Country, and will one day, in the near future, see the Irish leader of the House of Commons, Mr. Parnell, back to his native land, with the accompanying honors and ovations of the plundered exiles.

The meetings are largely patronized, and a splendid program of speeches, songs, music and poetry is floral at its semi-monthly entertainments. On last Monday the meeting was enlivened by some splendid singing and recitations. Miss Blanche Fraser who is possessed of one of the sweetest and most mellow voices since the Madame Ponisi, sang the popular ballad, "Kathleen Mavourneen" with admirable effect, the lustrous voice of the cultured songstress, in a pathetic manner, and the encore was a delightful rendition of "Bonnie Dundee" which delighted everybody. Mr. Thomas McGlynn who leader of the Boy Choir that sings in St. Mary's every Sunday at 10 o'clock mass, sang "Rose Ave Maria Filia." In very fine style; Maurice Kelly, only son of Mr. Arthur Kelly, a child of eight summers gave number of his splendid recitations. The talents of this mere child are simply marvellous, and will one day or another make him a leader of men. Miss Frank Dwyer gave "Ave Maria" in a very fine and fruitful manner. Mr. John F. McDonnell who was some months ago severely known in the whole mining and mill population, rendered a very fine rendition of "Mr. that quizzical him many laurels. Mrs. J. T. Brady, Mrs. John Sharon, Mrs. M. J. Kelly and J. W. Byers, also entertained the audience.

Michael Nugent, a constant reader of your paper, and relative by marriage to J. F. Egan, was buried last week from St. Mary's, after the Holy Sacrifice was celebrated for his soul. The funeral was attended by an immense cortege of sorrowing friends; he leaves a very large number of Irish daughters to weep over his untimely death. The deceased was a man of the people, and died at the age of forty-four years, surrounded by his children to the third and fourth generation. John Cavanagh whose mangled state was noted sometime ago in the MONITOR, is now pronounced out of danger. Cavanagh is a very estimable young lady of St. Mary's Convent, was married by her Rev. Father Kelly, a few days last, to Mr. Thomas F. McCormick. Their nuptials were celebrated in the mass many blessings on their new mate. Miss Alice Kennedy was bridesmaid.

After a three months sojourn in Oakland, Miss Mollie Kennedy returned to St. Mary's school renewed vigor on Monday, April 16th. Miss Mollie McGlynn has returned to the Comstock after an extended tour in California. Her many friends are rejoiced to know that she has entirely recuperated after a period of illness.

Several members of No. 41 Y. M. I. went down to Gold Hill on Carson City to organize another branch of this powerful young organization in the Capital City of the silver State, to show the prosperous state on the Comstock. Your correspondent, whose to date that the Comstock City, at for membership even read and is a member of the Knights of Pythias, and of the Masonic boys have an organization for the advancement of the Catholic Church, with no 50 of Carson and Gold Hill Hence, Comstock, July or August is considered the best date. Yours truly

CORRECT CORRESPONDENT.

A CONVERT IN CENTRAL AMERICA.

GUATEMALA, March 12th, 1888.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR—

Dear Sir—I have the honor to salute you most cordially, and to request the insertion of the following in the columns of your interesting journal, for the greater honor and glory of God, and for the edification of souls.

It is probable that you have taken place in this city of Guatemala, which has filled with great joy the hearts of all the Christians here. An American citizen, Mr. Francis Graves H. Hilliard, a native of Mobile, in the State of Alabama, in the United States of North America, the son of the late Colonel Hilliard and of Mrs. Agnes Scott Millar, after having been sufficiently instructed and having thoroughly reached the dogmas and morality of our Holy Roman Catholic and Apostolic Church, asked to be received in the arms of Protestantism, and to be baptized with all solemnity in the bosom of the Catholic Church of our Redeemer, in the Metropolis, on the 10th of March of the present year, and received for the first time the Sacrament of Confirmation.

At this event is a new triumph of Jesus Christ and of the Church, I do not doubt that you will give it publicity, for which I shall be extremely grateful. Without fear of presumption and of the highest esteem, I remain your most obedient humble servant,

FRANCIS XAVIER TORRES, Chaplain,
Parish of Our Lady of the Remedios.

THE BEST SUMMER RESORT ON THE PACIFIC COAST.

Each of our readers as may be contemplating a trip into the country for health and pleasure will find in Gilroy Hot Springs, which we mentioned in our columns this week, one of the most agreeable places on that coast where to spend a few weeks or months of restful rest and recreation. The medicinal properties of the Hot Springs for which Gilroy has become celebrated are reliably beneficial. Paralysis and also Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Dyspepsia, Liver and Kidney Complaints, Malaria, Chronic and the most obstinate of Diseases are easily healed, while the accommodations are spoken of by all visitors as the best on the Coast. The grounds are known as Moses Rock Spa, both of whom have made thousands of friends out of their patrons by the hospitality with which they treat all their visitors. The Springs can be reached by a journey of three hours by rail and two hours by stage. Take the Central Pacific to Gilroy, and from there a delightful mountain ride will bring you to the Springs. Our readers will find in the Springs a home, a cottage, or a single apartment to suit and accommodate the wishes of him or single person.

IN MEMORIAM.

MRS. CATHERINE CUNNINGHAM.

Died in Santa Clara, Cal., April 12, Catherine Cunningham, relict of the late James Cunningham, a native of Ballyhaise, County Cavan, Ireland, aged 78 years. Deceased was the mother of Mrs. James Kane and John F. Cunningham, a native of Tullamore, County Westmeath, Ireland, aged 45 years.

The hearts of near and dear ones have been wrung with grief at the death of this amiable and pious Christian lady, the fervent and consecrated servants of the Lord, (occurring at 11.30) within six months of her beloved husband, the blow is all the harder for her bereaved children to bear. Yet the Divine Master, who chastisteth whom He loveth, bounteth heavenly the fruits of sanctification, and pours balm into the fistula of sorrowed hearts, and the Christian Father has again and seven with the Proof of the strong her children for His consolation by the sight of her Christian resignation in active suffering during two long months of illness, and of a death precious in His divine eyes.

Hoping against hope, her dear one prayed that God would delay in judging her earthly release until her aged eyes should be gladdened with the sight of her son at the altar of God—a priest of the Most High, and her head be bowed low beneath his consecrated hands—fulfilled. Yes, the mother that bore him, and brought him to the Christ, and taught him to love Mary.

Glad that she knew what he for the best, has taken her to Himself, thus uniting father and mother in Heaven. Thus that himself should they doubtless will come in company with the angels and kneel around the throne of God on the glad day of their son's ordination, and behold with delight ineffable the fulfilment of the sacred filial dignity conferred upon him, and be thankful to him where he offers for the first time the Divine Lamb that was slain for the sins of mankind.

To her quiet grave in Santa Clara, we, who knew her and loved her, will carry the tribute of her holy memory, and a fragrant one it is. Her life was a life of Christian charity, of Christian faith and hope, and resolved for the first time in the Church, and the Church's Divine Lamb that was slain for the sins of mankind.

IN MEMORIAM.

JAMES COUGHLIN, a native of Ballyhaise, County Cavan, Ireland, died at his residence, Santa Clara, on Saturday, April 14, 1888, aged 78 years.

Sudden and sad he ended life,
Just as the dawn of Hope began
To form those bright clouds of mind and strife,
To cheer the way of a living man!

He lived his Faith, his country, too,
His generous worship, and with filial love,
Unto the Cross he was ever true,
May he be happy in the realms above!

"Our Jim has gone!" the neighbors say,
Brave and true hearted Friend and Son!
May the future, Jim, be refined day,
The record be—God's will and Union!

To end that death should unlit her path
Such friends where friends are left,
But God knows best. There is no heart
That sorrow never knew.

Dearest! dear Friend! thy father's pride;
Thy mother's ever loving son!
May Charity my sister be
That thy soul will glisten as the sun!

And when thy soul from state is free,
And Heaven is thy dwelling place,
Oh! pray for those who prayed for thee,
That they may see God's holy Face!

THE IRISH WATCHER.

A STORY IN TRUTH FOUNDED ON FACT.

On the confines of Meath, in the old County Cavan,
An old lady lived at a place called Kantavan
She was famous for her skill and for distributing alms,
And for praising the Bible and Protestant psalms.

Some said she was speculin' her fortune thinkin' plenty,
And others maintained that the Bible Society
Provided the means, when it was understood
That at praisin' the Bible the lady was good.

But that as it may, she employed now and then,
To take care of her farm some two sons of men;
They were stiff necked Irish, she said, led astray,
For they never attended Mass on the Lord's holy day.

And there was one not so evle as the rest,
Though it thinked he lazy to pass a good jest;
But that was not often—indeed, close were shave
Yet the neighbors all pampered the lazy knave.

But often his mistress her temper would lose,
As she looked through the antenna of Saunders' News.
The money was wasted, the time quietly flew,
And the converts she captured were shaky and few.

Her laborers all were determined to try
As they always had done on a Saint's Holy Day,
But she was determined they should go to work,
For she hated themselves and their prayers, the old Turk.

They would not go to work and she got so annoyed,
Every man of her help that day disappointed
Then got Walshers, and Mannans, English and Scotch
Then got Walshers, held stock-pyed, and thatch.

And when she got bigger when Sunday came round,
She was pressed thinn in style for their strict sobriety,
And swore to say so to the Bible Society.

When the corn was all in and the crops doing well,
Twould do your heart good to inhale the sweet smell,
For the red heather blossoms around you had thrown
For the sun to bake in the while that outdoor your Colleen.

It was on such a day the whole party did fly
Away at their ease, to make tetl on the hill;
'Twas a soft, dreamy day, near the middle of June,
And sleep came unsought with the hour of noon.

And now the old lady, you must bear in mind,
To her laborers all was grown cordinly kind;
For she lately took offer, on she sat down to dine,
To send them a goodly supply of white wine.

And Mathew was always detailed to convey
The milk to the men at the turf or the hay,
And this day he brought them two pails full of cream,
And to mix it they went to some spring near the stream.

While filling the water a big Mannan found
A nice wooden jug, with solid silly hound;
It intercepted the water, and then plain to view,
Were three or four quarts of the real "mountain dew."

The milk was untasted—each drank like a bird,
Till drank to a pragger each lay in the sward;
They gave Mathew a penny, he left them to watch,
And they lay down to sleep, the Walsh, English and Scotch.

The young parson went on a visit of peace,
And found the old lady 'mid turkeys and geese;
He was praising her help with the wisdom of Burke,
Till the said—well, we see then this evening at work.

But called for her phaeton and soon it came round,
And the parson just lifted her up off the ground—
Fixed her up in the seat, then gave her the whips,
And got smiles from her daughter, dear man, for his pains.

Then they started away at a nice easy jog
To see the Christians at work on the bog;
And Mathew was there as content as usual he,
Till the lady advanced he happened to see.

"My blessed," cried Matt, "on your big scurvy face,
What a darling you'd be if you'd switches your pace,
Till your nice foreign pale Eli awaks in surprise,
To bask in the light of your beautiful eyes."

The lady arrived, and at once she began
To view the whole scene, on the top of her fan,
When Mather cries, "Charley; he, Charley; get up;
You must be in need of another wax-ear."

But Charley stirred not, and Matt took up a sod,
A load sure enough for a dozen true-born Irish,
And he hit him—he hit him fair on the front of the head,
Enough to make Charley, if Charley were dead.

Then Charley looked up with a stare of surprise,
And rolled to poor Matt, "that your Irish eyes,
But Matt paid him back with an accent low Saying, "Charley, the mistress is waking yo here."

"Is hanged to the mistress!" But as he turned round,
Close on by his elbow the mistress he found;
And Matt started off like a scalded sib,
Saying, "Charley, you watch her the next time yourself."

The parson laughed hard, but he could not refrain
From laughing, but roared out again and again;
The mistress was pleased at the joke playing slave,
Now 'tis time we would learn to take care of ourselves;
And I really believe that our hypocrite Joe
Will not pay us a watchman, an Irish parson.

SAINTS OF MAY.

Anniversary Days During the Coming Month.

1st.—SS. PHILIP AND JAMES, APOSTLES.—St. Philip was a native of Bethsaida in Galilee, and was called by Our Savior to follow Him the day after St. Andrew. He preached St. Andrew. At his death he was buried at Hierapolis in Phrygia. St. James, surnamed the Less, to distinguish him from the other Apostle of the same name, was the son of Alpheus, and Mary the sister of the Blessed Virgin. He was martyred on April 10th, in the Year of Grace 62.

2nd.—ST. ATHANASIUS.—He was born at Alexandria about the year 296. He embraced a religious state of life at an early age, retired to a hermitage in the desert, and was subsequently ordained deacon. In 326 he was appointed Patriarch of Alexandria, and died in the year 373.

3rd.—ST. ALEXANDER, POPE.—He succeeded St. Evaristus in 109, and reigned nearly ten years, dying in 119.

4th.—ST. MONICA.—Monica was the pious mother of the great St. Augustine. She was born in 332, and after enjoying the happiness of seeing her illustrious son baptized, she died in 387.

5th.—ST. PIUS V., POPE.—This holy Pope was born at Bosco, Tortona, January 17th, 1504. He was ordained priest in 1528, consecrated Bishop in 1556, made a Cardinal in 1557, and was finally elected Pope in 1566. He died in 1572.

6th.—ST. JOHN BEFORE THE LATIN GATE.—St. John the Apostle was apprehended at Ephesus and sent to Rome in the year 95. By order of the Emperor Domitian he was thrown into a cauldron of boiling oil, but miraculously unharmed. Domitian was subsequently assassinated and our Saint was enabled to return to Ephesus. This glorious triumph of St. John happened without the gate of Rome, called Latina, hence his title.

7th.—ST. STANISLAUS, BISHOP AND MARTYR.—He was born July 26th, 1030, at Sucapanow, in the diocese of Cracow, Poland. He embraced a religious life at an early age, and was afterwards made Bishop of Cracow. He was murdered by the reigning King for upbraiding the latter for his many crimes against virtue in 1079.

8th.—ST. PETER, OF THE MISSIONS OF TARENTAISE.—He was a native of Dauphine where he was born in 1171. At the age of twenty years he left his home in Claterbach, and in 1142 he was made Archbishop of Tarentaise. He performed many miracles, and died in the odor of sanctity in 1191.

9th.—ST. GREGORY NAZIANZEN, B. C.—This saintly and celebrated doctor of the Church was born at Arianzum, in Cappadocia, about the year 329. His writings are voluminous. He died a happy death in 389.

10th.—ST. ISIDORE.—This Saint, who is the patron of the ancient city of Madrid, was born about a great many years ago, and died in 1170, aged sixty years.

11th.—ST. FRANCIS DI GIROLAMO.—He was born December 17th, 1642, near Tarantino, Naples. At an early age he entered the Jesuit Order, and after devoting a long life to Missionary work, died May 11th, 1716.

12th.—ST. PANCRAS, BISHOP.—He suffered martyrdom for the Faith at Rome, under Diocletian, in 304, and in the fourteenth year of his age.

13th.—ST. JOHN THE SIMPLE, BISHOP.—John had this surname given him from his love of silence and reflection. He was born at Nonpolis in Armenia in 454, and was ordained Bishop of Colonian, Armenia, in 482, dying in 558 at the advanced age of 78 years.

14th.—ST. BONIFACE, MARTYR.—He reformed a vicious and dissolute life, and boldly confessed his Christianity to the Pagan Simplicius, Governor of Colosia, and was martyred in 307.

15th.—ST. GENESIUS, MARTYR.—He was a holy Irish priest of the seventh century, who together with St. Dympna, another Irish Saint, was beheaded for the Faith.

16th.—ST. JOHN NEPOMUCENE, MARTYR.—Born at Pomuck in Bohemia, in 1330. Becoming connected with the Court of King Wenceslaus in his priestly capacity, St. John, for refusing to divulge to the King the confession of his Queen, was murdered in 1383.

17th.—ST. PASCHAL BAYLON.—Paschal was born in 1540 in the Kingdom of Aragon. He was admitted to an Order of Saints in 1564, and died May 17th, 1592, aged fifty-two years.

18th.—ST. VENANTIUS, MARTYR.—He was martyred in the persecutions of Decius in 250, at Camerine, a city near the Marquisate of Ancona in Italy, of which place he was a native.

19th.—ST. PETER CELESTINE, POPE.—He was born at Isernia in 1221, was crowned Pope August 29th, 1294, but out of his humility resigned that exalted office in the following December, and died May 19th, 1296, a most edifying death.

20th.—ST. BERNARDINE OF SIENNA.—This saintly disciple of St. Francis was born at Massa in 1380. He entered the service of God when quite young, and died on May 20th, 1444, aged sixty-three years.

21st.—ST. FELIX OF CANTALICE.—Felix was born at Cantalice, in the Papal State, in 1513. He entered the Capuchin Order, and established a long life by dying a most holy death on May 18th, 1587.

22nd.—ST. JULIA, VIRGIN AND MARTYR.—She was born at Carthage, and in 439 was sold as a slave to a Pagan merchant of Syria. Being afterwards abducted by Felix, a Pagan Governor of Corsica, she was martyred by him for refusing to offer sacrifice to idols.

23rd.—ST. JOHN BAPTIST DE ROSSI.—This Saint who was canonized by Pope Leo XIII. in 1881, was born at Voltaggio, near Genoa, February 22nd, 1698. He was ordained priest in 1721, and died May 23rd, 1764.

24th.—ST. DONATIAN AND ROGATUS, MARTYRS.—These two noble brothers suffered martyrdom for the Faith, and for refusing to sacrifice to Jupiter and Apollo by the tyrant Verus, in 287.

25th.—ST. MARY OF PAZZI.—She was born at Florence in 1566. Entering the Carmelite Order of Nuns in 1582, she passed a most sanctified life in prayer and meditation, dying May 25th, 1607.

What Come at Purchasing a Picture

A lot of furniture was heaped up near the threshold of a house, and two men stood there calling loudly for purchasers.

Some passers by stopped, but sorrowly had they cast their eyes on the objects exposed, when they continued on their way, the very biggest of them (mentally speaking). The auctioneer, wearied by his fruitless efforts, desisted therefrom, and, shaking his head, said to the little old man in spectacles standing by his side:

"You will have your labor for your pains, Master Cavendine. I am afraid there is no one in Dunsopee enough to buy the rickety furniture of Pelegrine's widow. All here is not worth three dollars.

"And the wretch owes me twelve" cried the little old man, striking the ground with his cane. "Twelve ducats, Jacob, as sure as I'm a Christian! more perhaps, because I had confidence in her husband. I furnished him with innumerable ostrichs, brooches and colors. Who could have known that he would die without paying me? I was too good-hearted, too confiding. You see all that the wretched dauber has left me in payment—this rickety furniture, a wife and four children. I can sell neither the children nor the wife, and the furniture—something, indeed, is worth three ducats. Ah, we poor people who have something for ourselves are very unfortunate, Jacob. Everyone borrows from us, deceives us, robs us. The sentimental looking hybrid bin, whispered

"Speak low, my willow is back there with her children, and you know she has some feeling; she would take all you say as a reproach. After all, Master Cavendine, it was not Pelegrine's fault that the fever carried him off.

"No, but it was his fault to have taken twelve ducats with it of merchandise from me."

"He would have paid you had he lived."

"I will believe it."

"Well, then, what are you complaining about?"

"What am I complaining about? cried the little old man in a rage—"that that he did not leave the means to pay his debts. That is always the way with your people. You are over upholding one another against the rich. You might as well say that the pragger gives a receipt of all debts to those whom he enters. Learn that those who have behaved right not to be unlevent."

The auctioneer shrugged his shoulders.

"Ah, well!" said he, "the honesty of poor people does not always depend on themselves; it depends also on Providence. They can only pay with their work, and when God deprives them of health it is not they that are unmeable. Who knows, but He who is unmeable, Who knows, but Yet the lady advanced he happened to see.

"Master Cavendine, but your twelve ducats may pay for your place in Paradise."

The little old man answered a scandalized air.

"I don't trifle about holy things," said he "busy yourself rather in calling customers than in making jests."

Jacob obeyed, smiling, while Cavendine approached the furniture scattered on the pavement, to examine again what he could gain from it.

The poor widow, in the meantime, had heard nothing of the conversation, or had been little moved by it, for she changed another expression not attitude. Seated in the doorway, she had her face in her hands, and her elbows on her knees, and her eyes fixed on the ground. Her attitude was the same as when, a few days before, she had seen her husband, her son, and her daughter, carried in from the field, and laid down upon his desk with tremendous love.

The young man had retirement rose from his chair and passed the floor of his office.

"I made a fool of myself," he said to himself. "Here I am, a young lawyer, without practice, in a little country town, with no clients, and I'm actually thinking of refusing twelve ducats to that no-account widow, who owes me twelve ducats to that no-account widow, who owes me twelve ducats to me, and who, if I'm not mistaken, is about to give us a child. Ah, Jacob, Jacob, I'm a fool, I'm a fool, I'm a fool

THE MONITOR.
TWICE-THIRTY YEARS OF PROGRESS
The MONITOR has the largest circulation of any Religious Paper published on the Pacific Coast.
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 25, 1888

EDITORIAL NOTES.

—The Pope, through his almoner, the Right Rev. Monsignor Cassetta, gave an Easter alms of three thousand dollars to the poor of Rome.

—The Belgian National Pilgrimage to Rome is now in the United States. It is under the direction of Mgr. Dontenlieu, Bishop of Liège, and Mgr. Lambreck, Coadjutor-Bishop of Gand.

—A New York daily paper which is fond of sensational news, says that the Pope has condemned "boycotting" and the "plan of campaign" in Ireland. We prefer, however, to await the arrival of the Vatican document before accepting newspaper advance in any matter appertaining to Ireland or her much-maligned people.

—An Eastern telegram says that in accordance with the ruling at the recent Catholic conference in Baltimore, it has been decided to have a superintendent of Catholic parochial schools in the various dioceses, and Archbishop Corrigan has appointed Rev. W. E. Dugnan, D. D., assistant Rector of St. Mary's, Grand street, to superintend the Catholic schools in New York. The purpose is to introduce greater system.

—The Roma correspondent of the Boston Pilot says that it is regarded as almost certain that amongst the Prelates raised to the dignity of the Cardinalate at the next Consistory held for this purpose the Bishop of Clifton, England, Mgr. Clifford, will be nominated Cardinal. His will, in such case, reside in Rome, and occupy some of the positions which Cardinal Howard has occupied, but which his state of health practically leaves vacant at present.

—The MONITOR assertion was honored on Monday last by the presence of our dear friend, Rev. Lambert Conrardy, of whose heroism in devoting himself to the Leper Mission at Molokai, Hawaiian Islands, we spoke last week. Father Conrardy will leave for Honolulu by the steamer which sails on May 3rd next. May the "Star of the Sea" guide the brave missionary safe to the scene of his future life-long exile, suffering and labors by which he hopes to earn an eternity of happiness!

—John A. Robinson, a wealthy gentleman of Norwich, Conn., who died recently, left a remarkable provision in his will. This document directed that his remains should be kept for three days before they were placed in the grave, where the lid to the coffin should be removed and the grave so closed that no person could readily get out. It also permitted no coffin-plate and allowed no "gaudy hallstones, too, are to be used." Every one of the directions was rigidly enforced.

—The Pope—or the most striking coincidence in all the world. The judges are going around from saloon to saloon declaring that there is little or no crime, and that no country could show a fairer record in that respect. Yet, while this is so, she is governed under one of the most galling and tyrannical Coercion Acts that ever prevailed in a civilized country. The rights of free speech, public meeting, and free press are abolished so far as prosecutions could effect their abolition. The Irish jails are filled with men who have simply insisted on exercising the elementary rights of citizenship.

—The fine portrait in oil of Pope Leo XIII., painted from life by Mr. H. J. Thaddeus, in whom our readers may recognize Mr. Henry Jones, of Cork, a city honorably identified with British art through James Barry, Daniel Maclise, Sam Ford, James Butler Bonneman, Lynch, Shiel, Hartland and a host of others, is at present on view at Messrs. Grardell's art gallery, Dublin. It is pronounced by connoisseurs to be a noble work of art, a speaking likeness, and the portrait by which the reigning Pontiff will be known to posterity. Since the time of Sir Thomas Lawrence no English artist has been honored with sittings from a Pope. The Irish artist is favored by Leo XIII. has attested the notice of notable persons who have visited his London studio.

—The Pope lately paid a peculiarly marked compliment to the great German Catholic historian, Janssen. At the final audience granted to the German pilgrims on March 4th, Leo XIII. asked very particularly after Janssen, "the illustrious historian, as he called him, adding, "tell me something about him; I should greatly like to see him." After Herr von Steinle had given his Holiness several particulars concerning Dr. Janssen and his state of health, the Pope said: "Salute him for me. Please go direct to him and salute him in the name of the Pope. His books are doing a great deal of good, are they not, and helping to remove prejudices? His calm, clear, exposition of facts, the citation of real historical documents, must certainly act by way of bringing light."

—The MONITOR has often cautioned its city readers regarding the riotous conduct which is carried on by the hoodlums element who make a regular business of attending public picnics on Sunday. So outrageous is the conduct of these miscreants that the North Pacific Coast (narrow gauge) Railroad has decided that they must cease, so far as the road is concerned. Tony Taylor will no longer be the favorite stamping ground for the San Francisco hoodlums, and Fairfax will be a respectable place henceforth. The hoodlums of San Francisco have outgrown decency so much at Santa Rosa that the police force of that town has been increased by swearing in fifteen special policemen. Catholic parents should by all means prevent their friends, relations and children from joining in these demonstrations and disreputable carnivals of crime.

The Latest Diabolical Calumny.

In the columns of the MONITOR we have been marvelled why the enemies of God's Church did not invent some new calumny, so as to lift themselves out of that rule which the whole of slander in dead centuries have made along the highway of time. And now, thanks to the inventive genius of the satellite of Satan, the reading world has before it a most malicious calumny of modern manufacture, the sole intent of which is to arouse the demon of anti-Catholic hate in the hearts of the American people. Here is the calumny in all its diabolical deformity, errors, misprints and all Exceptional Letter.

The following Encyclical letter, from the Abbey, may perhaps be of interest to the readers of the Women's Christian Temperance Union:—

Rome, March 1, 1888.

To the ladies of the Christian Temperance Union of America which shall need be pleased to send their most fervent benediction in your labor, health and success in the holy crusade against the Republican party of America, the sacred cause of the "Holy Catholic Church" of Jesus Christ on "Earth Below." For this we give glory to God, and consider it our duty, and we have pleasure to bless you as a people, and to grant you our fatherly peace and counsel.

Pushed by these sincere displays of devotion and will piety, and piedies to the cause of the ever faithful memories (the "Holy Mother the Church of America," you can—we be pleased by with the "Catholic Church," to the sacred heart of the "Virgin Mary.

By press and publicity placing yourself in communion with the parish priest in your place and city, we will most solemnly receive you, and impart to you the future instructions necessary to guide you to Paradise through the Holy Catholic Church of Rome.

It is with sorrow we learn that the most gifted of our country are Heretics, and leaders in the Republican party, which must be your enemies, with prayers and masses in order for Hence, at vespers, you will continue to offer up your pious supplication for the conversion of the heretics, the conversion of the Methodists, Baptists and Presbyterians churches, and all other so-called infidel societies. The Holy Ghost, in course of time, will be most effectively aliened, for the intercession of the Most Holy Mother of Our Christ, her beloved Son, whom I now represent at Rome. Moreover, be all and one of those who, with nobility, heart, aims such "Norman" we grant a remission of sins, and dispensation from penance; also we grant, so that they may be applicable to the souls of your friends in purgatory.

Given at Rome, near "St. Peter," under the seal of the "Fishermen," the 1st day of March, 1888, in the 15th year of our Pontification.

U. LEONCRUCI, Secretary.

We heartily thank the Catholic gentleman at Riverside, San Bernardino county, for having sent us this pestiferous production, which was published in the anti-Catholic Chronicle of that place, having originally appeared in the Attic of this city, from which it is said to have been copied.

The spurious document itself bears upon its face its own condemnation, hence it needs no words on our part to prove that Pope Leo XIII. never composed it, nor did it emanate from any Church authority at Rome or elsewhere.

In order, therefore, to show the bogus character of this calumny against the Church, and the great harm it may do the Pope and Catholic citizens, the MONITOR will pay to the Attic, or to its echo the Riverside Chronicle, the sum of five hundred dollars payable through the banking House of Messrs. Hamilton, Kelly & Co., of this city, if the latter will publish a diabolical document as the foregoing.

Here is a chance for the anti-Catholic Attic and its equally reprehensible echo at Riverside to make five hundred dollars very easily. We ask no penalty in case there is an exposure of the Catholic Chronicle's fail—as fail they will—to prove that such a scandalous, spurious and Satan-inspired document ever emanated from the present Pontiff who fills the Chair of Peter. Here these two conspirators against truth, decency, and the Church of God can win five hundred dollars in gold without risking a cent in return.

In the meantime, whilst waiting for the Attic and his anti-Catholic echo worker in infidelity, to justify themselves for thus grossly and maliciously insulting every Catholic in America, by printing such a scandalous document in their columns, we desire to inform our readers that the best way to stop all such slanders is to spatch them from existence at their first appearance. For this reason we hope Catholics in every section of this coast will send to the MONITOR any calumnies that may appear in the columns of their local press intended to defame the Church of God, so that we may be enabled to expose their mendacity and to correct the authors of them before the bar of public opinion.

The main duty of the Catholic press is the defense of Catholic principles and the propagation of sound Catholic thought, and any paper calling itself Catholic that possesses neither the energy nor the talent to meet every calumny and to crush it beneath the ever-revolving wheels of God's truth, is no better than a barren fig tree in the earthly garden of God.

Popes and Prelates, priests and Catholic people alike look to the Catholic press to defend the Church against the assaults made by its enemies through the anti-Catholic literature which is deluging the world today, and, however much some of our contemporaries may shirk this duty as nonessential, the MONITOR will carry out the duties devolved on it by Catholic consciences in resisting every rancorous assault against the citadel of Truth and will triumphantly vindicate the civil and religious rights of the Church and Catholic citizens against the vile calumnies and vicious aspersions of all our enemies—no matter from what source they emanate. This is the platform upon which we stand, and that is prospering so daily by doing our duty. With Him with us, we care not who is against us.

Since writing the above we have received the following Circular Letter from Right Rev. Francis Mora, Bishop of Monterey and Los Angeles, condemning the above spurious document with all the power of Episcopal authority.

BISHOP MORA'S LETTER.

TO THE PATRIARCH, OR THE DIOCESE OF MONTEREY AND LOS ANGELES:

Dearly Beloved Brethren—Being set up to govern in the Church of God, Intra, morevery responsible for the guidance of those committed to our care, we feel called upon at this time to address to you a few words of admonition. Not only are we, by our high office, obliged to keep the flock of Christ which has been committed unto us, but we are, moreover, so constrain by the watch tower of Israel, to give alarm when danger is imminent. Whatever leads to lawlessness in the church must receive our attention; whatever leads to the disciplin of the ministry necessarily demands on our part the vigilance which the care of a good shepherd for his Jesus Christ inspires. Thus, as a citizen of the Church and his land, the Vine Clad, we feel not authoritatively but when they take the form of a document purporting to be from the Holy Father, we feel it our duty, having some by our knowledge that a document of this sort, we publish a document containing a tirade against a certain political party, to be from the Holy Father, we feel it our duty to inform the world that the document is not issued from the Holy Father that it seems to have been formed for political purposes, if not to bring the Church of God and its Visible Head into disrepute. Whenever we receive from the Holy See documents of a political order which may be of utility to the faithful we immediately send them to the Clergy that be entrusted to us, we take care. This we do, so make a sure of their reception. We do so because the Holy Father, therefore, presents it to us. Any document, therefore, not from you by this sign, we do not consider authentic. We will look upon such a document, and we will look upon such a document, and we will look upon such a document, and we

Medical Value of Lemons.

Many people know the value of lemon juice in allaying bilious troubles. Many know nothing of the wonderful power wrapped up in the little yellow fruit, for the good lemon juice is so plentiful—so wonderful as it is harmless and simple. A lady who had suffered greatly with severe attacks of something akin to bilious colic hoops free from them so long as she faithfully takes lemon juice. Let her, though "feeling so well," neglect to take the juice of at least one lemon a day and in a short time symptoms of the return of the old enemy will make her only too glad to be faithful over that little thing. For several years this lady had been subject to these attacks, at times so severe as to indicate gall stones. No cure of diet or druggists' doses exerted them, and hope of relief was nearly gone when a friend said: "You even now—why not try lemon juice and water? Dr. Some body says a person need never be bilious who will take the juice of one lemon in water every night before retiring." Catching at this straw, the lemon were tried, and the juice in water without sugar, was freely drank whenever thirsty, and always the last thing at night.—One slight attack of the malady proved that the remedy was doing a good work, and after that, complete exemption for more than a year makes her an advocate of lemon juice. Sick headaches yield in many cases to this simple treatment. Some cannot bear the acid, but those who crave for it are very sure to be benefited by its use.

A Paying Apple Orchard.

Judge S. H. Axtell, who owns an apple orchard consisting of ten acres near Woodbridge, says the Lodi Sentinel has found the cultivation of that fruit very remunerative, as will be readily seen below. This orchard is situated on the slope between the upland and the Mokelumne river bottom-lands, it having been planted in 1857, thirty-one years ago. Mr. Axtell said to a Sentinel representative that from one tree he picked last fall three and one half barrels of apples, this yield being a fair average for the entire orchard. Each barrel holds 100 pounds of fruit, which makes 600 to the tree; and as there are 200 trees to the acre, the total crop per acre last fall was 120,000 pounds, all of which found ready market at 2 cents per pound, making the gross receipts $2400. Mr. Axtell said the best results would be obtained if there were 150 instead of 200 trees to the acre. On inquiring his, Mr. Axtell said, an apple-orchard six years old will produce sixty pounds of fruit per tree, or, at 2 cents, $4.80 which would make an income of $720 per acre. The total expense per acre—plowing, pruning, spraying and whitewashing, picking and packing and marketing, will not exceed, at the highest calculation, $75. The reader can readily see that the net income will be something over $600 per acre.

Mr. Axtell says that any person doubting the truth of these statements can call upon or address him at his ranch, when he will be glad to verify the above facts and give any information upon the subject.

Rules For Home Education.

1. From your children' early infancy accustom them to instant obedience.

2. Unite firmness with gentleness. Let your children understand that you always mean exactly what you say.

3. Never make promises you are not sure you will keep.

4. If you tell a child to do a thing, show him how to do it, and see that he does it.

5. Always punish your children for willfully disobeying you, but never punish in anger.

6. Never let them see that they vex you or make you lose your self-command.

7. If they give way to petulance and temper, wait till they are calm, and then gently reason with them on the impropriety of their conduct.

8. Remember that a little present punishment, when the occasion arises, is much more effectual than the threatening of a greater punishment should the fault be repeated.

9. Never give your children anything because they cry for it.

10. On no account allow them to do at one time what you have forbidden, under the like circumstances, at another.

11. Teach them to be good.

12. Accustom them to make their little recitals to perfect truth.

13. Never teach the boasting.

14. Teach them that self-denial, not self-indulgence, is the appointed and sure method of obtaining happiness.

Adam's Knives and Forks.

There are a number of things that the most inalienable and well-bred people now sit at the dinner-table with the fingers. They are:

Olives, to which the fork should never be applied.

Asparagus, whether hot or cold, when served whole, as it should be.

Lettuce, which should be dipped in the dressing, or in a little salt.

Celery, which may be properly placed on the table circle beside the plate.

Sour-berries, when served with the cream on, as they usually are in the most elegant houses.

Bread, toast, and all tarts and small cakes.

Fruit of all kinds, except melons and quarters which are eaten with a spoon.

Cheese, which is invariably eaten with the fingers by the most particular people.

Even the leg or other small pieces of birds are taken in the fingers at the fashionable dinners, and at most of the luncheons ladies pick small pieces of chicken without using a fork.

A Word to Young Men.

Father Ryan in an article in the C. T. A. News, about taverns and young men says:—"It is a very great misfortune that so many young men engage in the liquor traffic. Unfortunately we cannot say that thousands of young men are not painfully represented. With health, energy, reputation and good opportunities before them we cannot see how they can settle down to the level of the liquor traffic—to the level do I say—yes, beneath the common level, for it is almost invariably true that the saloon opened by a young man is among the lowest and vilest of its class."

A Beautiful Legend.

There is a legend illustrating the blessedness of performing our duty at whatever cost to our own institution. A beautiful vision of our Saviour had appeared to a monk, and in sleep bliss he was gazing upon it. The hour arrived in which it was his duty to feed the poor of the convent. He lingered not in his cell to enjoy the vision, but left to perform his humble duty. When he returned he again saw the blessed vision, and heard those words: "Hadst thou staid, I should have left thee."

A Careless Habit.

Flies are often started by a foolish habit that women have of petting warm ashes in a hot or barrel in the cellar. The first thing you know a live coal sets fire to the barrel, and then you have a fire that makes an awful lot of smoke and maybe suffocates somebody. Always put ashes in a tin pail.

Family Fun.

Proposing Under Difficulties.

"Yes," said the young man, as he threw himself at the feet of the pretty school teacher, "I love you and would go to the world's end for you."

"You would not go to the end of the world for me, Jamie. The world, or the earth, as it is called, is round like a ball, slightly flattened at the poles. One of the first lessons in elementary geography is devoted to the shape of the globe. You must have studied it when you were a boy."

"Of course I did, but—

"And it is no longer a theory. Circumnavigators have established the fact.

"I know, but what I meant was that I would do anything to please you. Ah Minnie, if you knew the aching void—

"There is no such thing as void, Jamie. Nature abhors a vacuum; but admitting that there could be such a thing, how could the void you speak of be a void if there was an ache in it?"

"I meant to say that my life will be lonely without you; that you are my daily thought and my nightly dream. I would go anywhere to be with you. If you were in Australia or at the north pole I would go to you."

"Pip! It will be another century before mam on fly. Even when the laws of gravitation are successfully overcome there will remain, says a late scientific authority, the difficulty of maintaining a balance.

"Well, at all events," exclaimed the youth, "I've got a pretty fair balance in the savings bank and I want you to be my wife. There."

"Well, James, since you put it in that light, I—

Let the curtain fall.

Bertie.

Mrs. Shannon gave a small but very elegant tea the other evening, and as a reward for being good for two hours, she allowed her son Bertie, aged 10, to sit at the table in the guests. We give a few of the quaint remarks made by Master Bertie during the progress of the meal:

"Ma," he asked trot, "whose spoons are these?"

"Hush, dear," said Mrs. Shannon.

He hushed for a second, then—

"Ma, whose big glass dish is that?"

"Little boys should be seen and not heard," said Mrs. Shannon, with a sickly smile that did not conceal from the guests the fact that there was a fearful reckoning in store for Bertie in their departure.

"Say, Ma," he put in, interrupting old Mrs. Mooney-wight, who was the special guest of this occasion, "that isn't our all-wool-and-a-yard-wide, is it?"

"Bertie, didn't you hear Mrs. Mooney-wight speaking? Behave this distressed person."

"Well, I'll be quiet if you'll tell me whose pretty glasses those are. They're Mrs. Bester's, aren't they?"

"Bertie!"

"Oh; ma, I forgot to tell you that Mrs. Hooker wantsyou to be sure and send back her teaspoons to-night, and—oh ma, did you know that Sally broke one of Mrs. Walker's nice teacups, and—oh, what a pretty plate this is! Who does it belong to?"

The doors had hardly closed on the last guest when the neighbors were appalled by a sound whose import could not be mistaken that Bertie's hour of reckoning had come.

Indefinite.

A man was being tried in court, and the particular question at issue was the number of persons present when a certain event occurred. An honest but simple-minded German was on the stand.

He had never taken an oath before, and was not a little disconcerted. The lawyer who conducted the cross-examination saw his opportunity, and badgered him with questions after the manner of his kind.

"How many did you say were present? he shouted, bringing his fist down upon the table as though the fate of empires trembled in the balance.

"Vell," meekly answered the witness, "of course I gould not shoot say, but I think dere vas between six and seven."

"Tell the jury what you mean by that," roared the lawyer. "How could there be six and seven! Were there six, or were there seven?"

"Vell" answered the witness "maybe it was wrong. There was more as six, but dere was not as much as seven. Oun vas a lerry leetle boy."

Too Much Education.

"Mrs. Cosser, I have not seen your Sam at school for some time. Is he sick?"

"Oh, no, mission, but he was gittin too larnal smart so we I took him out. Hookin lastin' hain't good for dat pickaninny, sahow."

"You must not entertain such ideas, Mr. Cosser; with a fair education he might become President of the United States."

"Dats sure, I don't hear whether dat chile is President or not. When I sees him he is drunk up dat quart of milk, I don't want him to be drunk, I want him do it with my own eyes, an' then hare dat next egg-nog he dat he drinks. I reckon he ought to have a good licking, I reckon dat my old man stole an armful of wood when he only borrowed it. No, mission, dat chile won't go to school no mor."

Queer Propitiation.

At a Boston hotel the head waiter once went to the office and informed the learned and cultured clerk that a man was making a disturbance because he could not have his accustomed seat at the table.

"Go in again," said the Browning-saturated clerk, "and propitiate him in some way; I leave it to you."

Back went the waiter to the dissatisfied boarder and said: "If you don't like the way things is done here, you can get right out or I'll propitiate you pretty quick."

Fatal Delay.

The young man had been sitting to tell her how madly he loved her for over an hour, but couldn't plack up the courage.

"Excuse me a moment, Mr. Faithedly," she said, "I think I hear a ring at the telephone," and in her eagerness she ran her into an adjoining room.

Promptly she returned, and then his mad passion found a voice.

"I am sorry, Mr. Faithedly," she said, "to cause you pain, but I am already engaged, Mr. Sampson, learning that you were here, has urgled his suit through the telephone."

He Gave up the Money.

The dispute between the two Ampchiels became warm.

"Do you suppose I don't know whether I've got the measles or not?"

"Do you think I can't tell the measles when I see 'em? You hain't got measles no more'n my foot has."

"Bet you a $2 bill."

"Done."

The matter was referred to a physician. "You will have to wash yourself, sir, before I can decide," said the man of pills.

"Wash myself to win $2! Soap you in thunder first. Give him the money.

THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY.

Hoping to Lay the Corner-Stone by the First of May.

WASHINGTON, April 17.—On the brow of the hill overlooking the eastern grounds of the Soldier's Home, says the Star, stand the remains in bits, must be seen a group of workmen; a line of horses and mules emerge from the woods on the side of the hill, their slow course marked by a trail of red clay, all this meaning the beginning of the work which is to result in the erection of the splendid buildings of the new Catholic University. As is well known, the site selected is the old Middleton place, which was purchased some months ago. It has a large acreage, and the old-fashioned driveway, between rows of trees, leading to the house, starts from the inter-section of Lincoln avenue with the Bunker Hill road. The grounds extend to Brookland, Metropolitan Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and the railroad station bears the name of the place. The distance from the city is two and a half miles. As the crow flies, the plan of the University was as nearly as possible adapted, the plan of the University was as nearly as possible adapted to a very comprehensive one, and contemplates the erection of at least seven large buildings. At the present time it is not thought necessary to erect more than one of these, but it will be anywhere to be with you. If you were in one of the largest. The excavating now being made, in 200 feet long, 70 feet wide and 30 feet deep, will be the foundation of the new building, which will be a massive structure in the Romanesque style of architecture. It will be known as the Divinity Hall, and in the proposed groupings of buildings it will occupy the prominent position in the western point. The building will front to the south, and from its elevated position, "I've got a pretty fair balance in there will be a good view of the country looking towards the city, with its smoky effa-vium hovering over it at its feet. The building will be built of Potomac stone will be largely used in the construction, and its effectiveness as a building material may be seen in the Corcoran Gallery, Church Washington. Upon the left side of the building will be an L wing, where the chapel will be. Provision for a tower, to be placed on the other side, which will be added afterwards. The building will contain class rooms and a large lecture hall. The rooms are to be 30 feet square, and will accommodate 30 students. It is expected, if the weather continues favorable, that in two months a few weeks the work on the foundations will be begun. It is thought that the building will be ready for occupancy by the fall of 1889. Cardinal Gibbons, who is deeply interested in this enterprise, expects to preside at the corner-stone laying, and the event will be a notable one.

The New Abbot of St Vincent's Conference.

LATROBE, Pa., April 16.—A cablegram has been received at St. Vincent's Monastery from Rome stating that the Pope had confirmed the election of the Rev. Andrew Hintenach as Abbot of St. Vincent's. Father Hintenach is at present pastor of a church in Tuscumbia, Ala. He is about 45 years of age and was ordained at St. Vincent's. The official papers now on their way from Rome to America.

ARCHBISHOP SEGHER'S REMAINS.

A Government Vessel Detailed to Remove Them.

Some time ago his Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons, Prefect of the Propaganda, Archbishop Feraneelli, Secretary of the Propaganda Tresoury, to whom the authority is vested, re-quested him to authorize Captain Healy of the revenue cutter Bear, cruising in Alaskan waters, to convey the remains of Archbishop Seghers to Victoria, B. C. Secretary Fabcelli gratefully acknowledged the receipt of Captain Healy's letter to Archbishop Gross, the Cardinal, in a letter to Archbishop Gross, the Cardinal, in a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, preferring the request that a Government vessel be detailed.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 31, 1888.

His Eminence, Cardinal James Gibbons, Archbishop of Baltimore:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter enclosing one of the Pius Society, in which you request the United States revenue steamer Bear, which is cruising in the waters of Alaska the coming summer, to convey from Onalaska to Victoria, B. C., the remains of the late Archbishop Seghers of Vancouver Island, who was murdered over a year ago by Indians, while performing missionary duty. In reply I beg to state that the Bear will probably be ordered to proceed to Alaska at an early date, and instructions will be issued to her commanding officer in accordance with your request. Very respectfully,

C. S. FAIRCHILD, Secretary.

FAIR IN ST. CHARLES PARISH.

The bonanza in aid of the parish of St. Charles's opens this (Wednesday) evening in the new church, St. Joseph and Dauphine streets, and will continue. Too booths have been erected, and are very tastily decorated. It is confidently expected that the fair will be a grand success, and to repay all of the comfort to the visitor by will attend it both for the pleasure to be had and the good to be conferred, to complete the beautiful new church of St. Charles'.

SPRING TIDE.

Of all the season's of the year,
Young Spring I ever love most dear,
Because in these balmy hours
All nature is arrayed in flowers.

For all these fragrant petals fair
Received a Godhead's master care.

Oh, Spring! thy beauties still inspire
My soul with poetic fire,
And bids me feel the mighty power
That gave to Earth so fair a flower.

TO OUR BLESSED LADY.

Sweet Lily of Eden, Immaculate Maid,
When danger assails me, O come to my aid;
Preserve me all pure in this dark world of sin
O guard me without and defend me within!

Mask flower of humility, teach me to be
The queen of the world—from folly to fly;
Without that fair virtue I never can see,
O Mary, thy face—then obtain it for me!

Deep red rose of charity, teach me to love
Thy pure blessed Son, Who is crighing above;
Again may I never His wounded Heart pain,
By darkening my soul with iniquity's stain.

O may to Jesus, dear Mother, most mild,
O my to Him, Mary, that I am thy child;
Remind Him of all His has suffered for me—
His Bride's bitter anguish in Gethsemane!

The scourging He bore at the pillar of stone—
Scorn of all comfort, forsaken, alone;
The crown of sharp thorns enclosing His Head,
The wound in His Side which for poor sinners bled.

His calm resignation to God's Holy Will;
His last painful journey up Calvary's Hill;
His faintness and thirst as he branded His lips
dry;
The three hours He hung in His dread Agony!

And offer Him, Mary, thy sorrow and tears,
The sufferings thou baded from thy earliest years,
Unless for my sake thou, as my guardian of heart—
Remind Him to bless me are life shall depart.

O Mary, to whom we in gladness and woe,
In sleeping, in waking, whenever I pray
Turn, Mary and Joseph, at the moment of death,
May thou loved name be uttered by my latest breath.

M. A. CUSHION.

THE MADONNA.

It was in years agone—long, long ago—
When life was full of childhood's vicious rare,
When life's sorr hasn't a sorrow or a woe,
I saw a picture—a Lady fair.

The picture hung upon a chapel's wall,
And the soft glamour from the taper's glow
Crowded, as on the picture it did fall.
The work of some inspired Angelo.

It was a picture of the Queen of Love,
The guiding star of Life's tempestuous sea;
It was of Her who reigns in Heaven above,
The Queen of Heaven, and of thee and me.

Ah! I remember how that picture wrought
A sacred awe into my childish heart;
And, gazing on that picture there, I thought
For aught I would to be like Mary or to part!

They all the years since then that I have seen,
They all the years that swiftly swept by me,
That picture of the Queen to me has been
A Maiden star upon Life's stormy sea.

Back to that little chapel oft I turn,
To see that Mother as I saw her there;
Back, back in fancy do I oft return,
To see that picture of the Virgin fair.

The sight of that sweet picture clings to me,
Of childhood's years an heirloom to my heart
And memory. O Mary, would that we Could be united with thee, so'st to part!

Child and Clown.

A Story from the French.

CHAPTER I.

The child lay on his little, white bed daintily, safe, and looked, with eyes made all the bigger by fatar straight before him steadily, and with the strange intensity of the sick, who already perceive what those who are well cannot see. The mother, at the foot of the bed, biting her fingers so as not to cry out, anxious and tormented with her suffering, watched the progress of the disease over the poor, thin face of her little boy, and the father, a fine fellow, though he was only a workingman, held back in his eyes the tears that burned on their lids. And the first light of the dawn, clear, gentle, the light of a fair morning in June, came into the narrow bedroom on the Rue des Abbesses, where lay dying the little Francois, son of Jacques Legrand and of Madeleine Legrand, his wife. He was a boy of seven years. A blonde and rosy little chap, who not three weeks before, had been as lively and as chipper as a sparrow. Her a fever had seized him, and they had brought him home one evening from school with his head so hot and his hands so limp, that the mother, who had lost her three on the way, and sometimes in his delirium he would say, looking at the nicely polished shoes that he wore had carefully set in the corner: "You see there those are very new—like Francois shoes. Little Francois will not wear them any more. Little Francois will not go to school again—never, never."

Then the father would cry out: "Will you be quiet?" and the mother would go and hide her face in her pillow, so that little Francois would not hear her weep. Through the night that had just passed the child had had no delirium, but for two days he had bothered the doctor by a strange sort of despondency, which resembled a surrender to death as if, though but seven years old, the sick boy had already experienced the weariness of life. He was tired out, apparently, silent, sad, tossing his weak hand backward and forward on the pillow, unwilling to take anything, having no longer a smile on his poor, thin lips, and wish has languorously something, seeing no one knew what, far off, far away. "There, above us, perhaps," thought Madeleine, who shivered at the thought. When they wanted him to take his medicine, some syrup maybe, or a little beef tea, he refused everything.

"Do you want anything, Francois?"

"No, I want nothing."

"You must eat him out of this," said the doctor. "This torper alarms me. You are his parents; you should know your child. Think of something which may amuse this little fellow, bring back to earth the mind which is roaming among the clouds." And then he went away.

"Think of something!" (Ah, yes, beyond a doubt they knew him well, their Francois, those good people. They knew how much he was amused, the little fellow, when on Sunday he would forage in the hedges, and would come back to Paris on his father's shoulder loaded with hawthorne. Jacques Legrand had bought for Francois all sorts of images, and he put them on the child's bed and made them dance before the wandering eyes of the little fellow and, all ready to cry, tried to make him laugh. "Now, do you see, 'tis the broken bridge. The ass. And here is a General. You remember we saw a General once in the Bois de Boulogne. If you will take your medicine I will buy a real General for you, with a cloth coat and gold epaulettes. Do you want him—the General? Tell me.

"No," replied the child, in the dry rage low and arrow.

"No," answered the little voice, almost cruel in its distinctness.

And to all that they said to him, to all the pimping jests, to all the ballooms that they promised him, the little voice—the parents call the while looking at each other in despair—answered: "No! no! no!"

"But what do you want, then, my Francois?" asked the mother. "Come, now, there must be something that you would like to have. What is it? Tell it to me, your maman." And she laid her cheek down on the pillow of the sick boy, and she whispered her request in his ear, as if it were a secret between them. Then the child, rising in his bed and stretching out towards something invisible an eager hand, replied suddenly with a strange accent and in an earnest tone, that was as once supplicating and imperative.

"I want Bonn-Bonn!"

CHAPTER II.

Bonn-Bonn!

The poor Madeleine threw a frightened look at her husband. What did the little one say? Was it the delirium, the terrible delirium come back?

Bonn-Bonn!

She did not know what it meant, and she was frightened at those queer words, which the child now repeated with the wilfulness of a sick person, as if, not having dared until then to formulate his dream, he would cling to it with an invincible obstinacy.

"Yes, Bonn-Bonn! Bonn-Bonn! I want Bonn-Bonn!"

The mother had seized in her nervousness Jacques's hand, and said in a low voice, as though she were out of her wits: "What does that mean, Jacques? Oh, it is all over with him."

But the father had on his rough face a smile that was almost happy—and a bewildered smile also—the smile of a condemned man who detects a possible chance for liberty. Bonn-Bonn! He will remember the Easter morning when he had taken Francois to the circus. He had still in his ears the child's great burst of joy, his hearty laugh—the laugh of an amused youngster, when the clown—the splendid clown, all spotless with gold, with a sparkling, many-colored dress, on the back of which was set a big brown butterfly—performed his antics in the ring, played tricks on the riding master, or held himself motionless on the ground, his head down and his feet in the air, or threw up to the chandeliers the soft felt hat and caught it adroitly on his head, and where the man performed a pyramid, and at each trick, like the refrain of a song, lighting up his big, droll, bright face, the clown intured the same cry, repeated the same word, accompanied sometimes by a yell of drama—Bonn-Bonn!

Bonn-Bonn! And every time that it came round, Bonn-Bonn! the child burst out in bravos, and the little one laughed his heartiest. Bonn-Bonn! It was this Bonn-Bonn, the clown of the circus, the man who entertained a good part of the city, that he wished to see, the little Francois, and that he might not have and might not see, because he was thus, sick and weak, in his white bed.

That evening Jacques Legrand brought to the child a painted clown, with spangles sewed on all over, that he had bought at a high price, the price, in fact, of a day's work. But he would have given twenty, thirty days, a year's labor to bring back a smile to the pale lips of the sick boy. The child looked for a minute at the toy as it shone on the white bedclothes, then said, sadly:

"It is not Bonn-Bonn! I want to see Bonn-Bonn!

Ah! if Jacques could have wrapped him in his still, curved him off, taken him to the circus, taken him to the clown dancing under the lighted chandelier and said to him, "There is Bonn-Bonn!"

He did better than this, this good Jacques. He went to the circus, he asked for the clown's address, and timidly, with limbs weakened by emotion, he mounted step by step the staircase that led to the house of the artist in Montmartre. It was very bold what he had come to do here. Jacques, a workman, and of a class who are willing to go and play, to recite monologues in the drawing-rooms of fine people. Perhaps the clown—ah, if he only would!—may be willing to come and see poor little Francois. What mattered it how they received him, Jacques Legrand at Bonn-Bonn's house? He was no longer Bonn-Bonn! It was M. Moraine who, in the rooms of an artist, among Dodo, exercising an artistic elegance making a choice background to a charming man, who, received Jacques in his office like that of a physician. Jacques started, did not recognize the clown, and turned his soft hat over and over in his hands. The other waited. Then the father excused himself. It was surprising what he had just asked—it could not be done—impossible, and then in fact it related to the little boy. "A fine little boy, moreover, and so intelligent! Always the first in his class, excepting in arithmetic, which he did not understand. A dreamer, this little fellow, do you see. Yes, a dreamer. And the proof—there, the proof—" and Jacques hesitated, stammered, and then plucked up courage and abruptly said: "The proof is that he wants to see you, that he thinks only of Bonn-Bonn!"

The artist looked at the speaker with a kind of pity. He was not a bad man, this artist, when the boy went out for the first time; "because in fact, you see, I love you somewhat."

The clown offered to his parents his two hands, the hands of a sweet and amiable man. "A good shake of your hands," he said. Then kissing both of the child's cheeks, which had recovered some of their roseness, he added, laughing: "The permission to print on my visiting cards: 'Bonn-Bonn, acrobatic doctor, Physician in Ordinary to the Little Francois.'"

Tramps in Germany.

In Germany beggary has vastly increased since the war. Tramping, too, is easier since the abolition of the strict law of settlement, which made a pass necessary for every journey beyond the parish boundary. The French millionaire made the German fancy they had suddenly become fabulously rich. Everybody lamented over the hard times, particularly in Europe became a nation of speculators and gamblers. Railways were planned in all directions, crary third rate towns began to build grand asylums. This drew thousands of laborers off the land, and when the bubble burst, and the nation realized the fact that the millionaire were not in circulation at all, but locked up in the Treasury, thousands of the laborers were thrown out of work and obliged to go on the tramp. Most of the tramps are literally homeless, having no place to which they are legally entitled to shelter and employers are very shy of keeping any of them long enough to give them a claim on their place. No wonder, then, that German tramps are beginning to form packs, like the wolves. Such a pack will swoop down on a lonely village, while the men are away in the fields, and extort money and food from the women, the military policemen looking hopelessly on. If the village starts a suit and prosecution, that means a good many extra jettonge in the local rates, so they are allowed to pass off. Some villages prefer paying blackmail, like the isle of Man shopkeepers. Lodging, too, is sold—or refused, for, if the barn door is kept locked, the farmer "may see the red cock perch upon his thatch!"

OUR BLESSED LADY.

Some Favors She Granted.

The great Oblate missionary, Father Hoecken, O.M.I., remarks his sermons with stories taken from his own personal experience, and among the anecdotes he tells are some startling than the sentimental dreams of fiction. Among the manuscriptions of his career in England, he relates the following incident:

In one of the manufacturing towns where Father Cook gave missions, a Protestant lady, after hearing some of the instructions, asked permission to be admitted to the church. On the morning of her baptism, she said:

"You cannot imagine the splendor of this day. My husband is an atheist. He is naturally hopeful he has his parents, who were Catholics and later on he spent a few months in a Catholic college. But he was brought up by Protestant relatives and when he was grown to manhood he fell into infidel surroundings. The result is that to-day he sneers at religion as a superstition, and scoffs at the name of God.

"Up to the Blessed Virgin, and the Blessed Virgin alone, I owe the grace to touch your husband's heart.

"Accordingly she has been my constant prayer for years, kneeling at the shrine of the Mother of God, invoking her aid to pray for the conversion of this atheist.

The same evening the convert presented her husband to make his acquaintance with the missionary. His was amused at the sight of the clergyman's priestly garb. He asserted his wife that if he went with her, he would go to hear a good sermon, but he would not be bound to become a Catholic. When he was introduced to Father Cook, the latter saw at once a young, good-natured and intelligent man.

"You have been doing a useless piece of work," he said, "in bringing a Catholic of my wife. But I shall not trouble her. For a lark, put him out of the house!

"You live?" asked Bonn-Bonn.

"Yes, sir, I live. Rue des Abbesses."

"Very well, said the other. "His wants to see you. Do you say? At night, he shall see Bonn-Bonn!"

CHAPTER III

When the door opened before the clown, Jacques Legrand cried out cheeringly to his boy: "Now, Francois, be satisfied, you rogue. See, there is Bonn-Bonn!"

And into the child's face there came a happy light. He raised himself in his mother's arms and turned his head towards the door, and, looked for a moment to see who was this gentleman in the frock coat at his father's side, the gentleman, who so good, jolly face was then smiling on him, and whose lips seemed to say and when they spoke to him: "That is not Bonn-Bonn." he fell back slowly, sadly, with his head turned on the pillow and lay there with his eyes fixed, his big blue eyes that saw beyond the walls of the little bedroom and that looked for, that were always looking for Bonn-Bonn! speaking and butterfly as a lover pursues his dreams.

"No," replied the child, with a voice no longer dry, but distressed, "no—that is not Bonn-Bonn.

The clown, standing near the little bed, bent a profound gaze on the face of the sick little man, a gaze dark, full of tender sweetness. He shook his head, looked at the amazed father and broken down mother, and smiling: "He is right it is not Bonn-Bonn! and he went out.

"I will not see, I shall never see him again, Bonn-Bonn—now repeated the child, in a voice so low that it seemed to be already whispering to the angels. "Perhaps Bonn-Bonn is over there yonder, where little children go to pray.

And suddenly—he had not been gone half an hour—the door was rudely opened and in he black silk gown, with an expiatory gin, his head bent under the weight of his sorrows, and on his face all chalked, Bonn-Bonn, the real Bonn-Bonn, the Bonn-Bonn of the circus, the Bonn-Bonn of the little Francois. Bonn-Bonn himself appeared. And on his face, pale, with a lively exaltation in his eyes, laughing, crying, happy, saved, the child clapped his little thin hands, shouted leave" and cried with all the joyfulness of a seven-year-old, bursting out suddenly like a lighted rocket: "Bonn-Bonn! "Tis he, 'tis he this time. This is Bonn-Bonn, ever! Hurrah for Bonn-Bonn! Good morning, Bonn-Bonn

When the doctor came that day he found, seated at the bed side of the little Francois, a white faced clown who kept the little fellow laughing all the time and who said to the sick boy, pretending a lump of sugar at the bottom of a cup of medicine

"You know if you do not drink it, little Francois, that Bonn-Bonn will not come to see you again.

"And the child drank it."

"Isn't it nice

"Very nice, thank you, Bonn-Bonn.

"Doctor," said the clown to the physician, "I have a little secret to tell you. Be sure, ever, that my antics do him as much good as your prescription.

The father and mother sayt, but this time it was because of their happiness. And crying day until little Francois was able to leave his bed a carriage stopped before the door with a clown at the Rue des Abbesses, and there stepped from it a man wrapped in a heavy cloak with the cape turned up and beneath, dressed for the circus and with a painted face.

"What do I owe you, sir," said Jacques Legrand to the clown at the end of his cash, when the boy went out for the first time; "because in fact, you see, I owe you something."

The clown offered to the parents his two hands, the hands of a sweet and amiable man. "A good shake of your hands," he said. Then kissing both of the child's cheeks, which had recovered some of their roseness, he added, laughing: "The permission to print on my visiting cards: 'Bonn-Bonn, acrobatic doctor, Physician in Ordinary to the Little Francois.'"

The Virgin Mother of Good Counsel.

From hundred years ago there lived in Genazzano an old and poor woman named Petruccia, who was the guiding stock of the village and who had given up all her little property in order to restore the ancient church of the Virgin Mother of Good Counsel which had fallen into ruin. Poor as she was she was the very image of cheerful faith begun the work, and now when the walls of the little edifice began to rise and she had started were hardly six feet high, Petruccia had to stop for she had spent all her little. The artisans refused to work without pay. "I told you so," said the poor woman's cozy wife to her sister and commiserations pity of her neighbors. But while worthily holy minded wanting, Our Lord was preparing to complete the work which had been begun for Him, and that with one of the miraculous manifestations of His Power which from time to time are scattered like a few stars upon the history of the Church.

On the 25th of April, 1467, the early feast in honor of St. Mark was being held in Genazzano and a great concourse of folk from all parts of the country were gathered together for besides the religious festival they had come to the annual fair which was held on that day. The High Mass was over and the people were in full flow with the excitement and bustle on the fair, when an unknown pilgrim left the side of the church in the town ranged in rows towards, that unknown to the world, Petruccia's house. The peasants listened. Songs it angels in unknown tongues were heard to stay, and far up in the beautiful blue heavens was seen a small white cloud, hovering on the spot where the Virgin of light darted from that cloud, and as it approached earthwards the cloud of light grew more and more ravishing and sweet. Slowly it descended, and it rested over the poor, unknown hut of the work as dear Petruccia's home. Soon the cloud melted away, and revealed the kneeling and amazed-eyed multitude a beautiful picture! Our Lady with the Child, all lovely in colors and close to, but not touching, the walls, suspended in the air without any visible support, yet so near that Our Lady of Good Counsel had consented to plete the church. Miracles were at once wrought at the shrine, and the devotion and enthusiasm of the people was so great that for what they called "Our Lady of Pieta" there also was erected a church, and a convent for the Augustinian Friars, and in their gratitude they at once took up Petruccia, who had had the privilege also of seeing the whole church restored, and the Pieta of the Virgin Mother of Sorrows, of God's clemency and most lavish gifts.

Our Lady of Good Counsel has been a most perfect explanation. A few days after St. Mark's day, the town of the sanctuary was in a state of the highest glory and wide and crowds of persons were attracted to Genazzano by the wonderful news of the miracles, by name lowerings and Bethlehem, as the Virgin Mother and Child, the holy picture from time transports of joy and delight, and the earliest reports of the story lastly in that year they had deter mined to leave their native towns and their homes, and to settle down in that town which their country had been reduced to the ownership of the Virgin Mother. Where the departure came they went to pay a farewell visit to the Pieta of the Virgin Mother, and the immediate work of God at that parting. Some children of Mother and Child had been moved to leave their native place, Genazzano, and to settle down in a

Dr. Macfarlane on "Crazy" Catholic Saints.

Dr. W. W. Macfarlane is Superintendent of the Sonoma Asylum—Agent in Spain, and I learn from the San Jose Mercury that he read on a recent occasion a "very interesting" paper before the members of the State Medical Society, the "interesting" document in question containing the combined wisdom of the Committee on Medical Diseases and Peculiarities, of which Dr. Macfarlane is the honored Chairman.

Among the different very doubtful statements made by the medical gentlemen who composed the "very interesting paper" in question, we had several references to the Catholic Church which call for some strictures on the part of the MONITOR in order to make this already "interesting paper" of Dr. Macfarlane et al. still more "interesting" even than it would be were it permitted to pass unnoticed.

The most serious charge that this Committee of medical gentlemen bring against the Catholic Church is couched in the following language, as we find it in the Mercury:

"During the dark ages many religious frauds were created. The mawkish sentimentality of those ages was abundant for several centuries. St. Simon, for example, lived for thirty years on the top of a tower only three feet in diameter, and stood for a whole year on one leg, the other being covered with sores. Had he lived during our time, he would have been sent to an asylum for the chronic insane.

We cannot close this article with all the arrogance and dogmatism which characterizes the foregoing paragraph. The manner in which these medical critics of the Catholic Church charge her with crime, and then convict her without the use of judge, jury or justice, is certainly far more novel than it is honest or Christian. If the Church of God were a human being and became afflicted with any dangerous or contagious disease, these Doctors would make a careful diagnosis of the case; they would go into the minutest details concerning the origin of the disease, the cause of its development, and the proper treatment of the patient. But as these Doctors seem to imagine that the Catholic Church is only a corpse upon the dissecting table, they take no trouble whatever to give a single reason for the irreverent, inthinking and ridiculous conclusions which they arrive at, nor to palliate in the least the preposterous calumny which they have thus propagated in an official document coming from the medical fraternity of California.

Is this right? Is it Honest? Would any of the medical gentlemen comprising this Committee like to have his character slandered and his conduct in life thus libeled? Who would think or feel if a jury of twelve dealers were to issue a manifesto charging the members of the State Medical Society with being members of a Board of body-snatching quacks? No doubt these gentlemen would feel highly indignant that such a proceeding should be propagated by persons of such circumscribed mental abilities and medical knowledge as junk-dealers are generally supposed to be. Yet the action of Dr. W. W. Macfarlane and the other members of the anti-Catholic committee who wrote this remarkably "interesting" paper, is precisely of this character.

By what authority did these Doctors dare to arraign the Catholic Church as having canonized "many lunatics"? What proof they had that the Church did so even during the era of the world to which they apply the hackneyed phrase "dark ages"? and then the despicable nonsense which led these Doctors to inject into an official document the disgraceful insinuation that the Catholic Church had plenty of material (that is crazy people) for "manufacturing saints" during several centuries.

These dogmatic doctors seem to have graduate in ignorance. At least so far as the ecclesiastical history and customs of the Catholic Church are concerned, they certainly are as much in the dark as are the Millerites concerning the Millennium! Had they possessed even a slight knowledge of the tedious delay, the rigid scrutiny, the exhaustive examination and the perspicuous proof which must accompany all cases for canonization, and which are required from the advocates of those holy persons who are proposed for that immortal honor, these deluded Doctors would have saved themselves the humiliation of being forced by the Catholic press to swallow their own prescription!

According to the unofficial blue of these medical gentlemen St. Simon Stylus was a lunatic! Yet these physicians will no doubt be astonished to be told that the saint whom they in their ignorance of the hagiology of the Catholic Church call "a fool," was a far wiser man and a far more useful member of the human family than any modern, materialistic medicos who ever met within the walls of that Athens of absurdity at Agnew's Station! This may appear strong language to the gentlemen who composed the "very interesting paper" we are criticising, but the MONITOR has the character of never advancing an idea that is not susceptible of proof, and before we get through with the anti-Catholic committee now under dissection, we will prove the truth of this assertion so clearly that every Agnewite attaché will be convinced that it is the living Doctors who are "crazy," and not the celebrated saint whom they hold up to the scorn of the world through their ignorance, pride, prejudice and presumption combined.

Sane, indeed, must be that man whom the Catholic Church elevates into the ecclesiastical rank of Saint. If Dr. Macfarlane and his fellow-committeemen imagine that the Church of God cannot distinguish "a fool" from a wise man—they had better not submit their heads to be examined by the College of Cardinals! God is Omnipotent Wisdom, and wise beyond human lore are those who dwelt at God's fountain of knowledge and who derive their mental pabulum through His inspiration.

Medical men in modern days are not celebrated for any remarkably astute love for God; on the contrary, those of the school of Agnew's Station seem to glory in exhibiting their ignorance of the one state in the calendar they tried to make "a fool" of! It must have been some lunatic fulling who spelled Jesus with an "y" that invented the story of "St. Simon" standing on one leg for a whole year! The medical committee are made to say that had St. Simon "lived during our time he would have been sent to an asylum for the chronic insane." Well, for the sake of St. Simon's celebrity the MONITOR is very glad he died long before "our time," for had he been sent to the asylum for the chronic insane at Agnew's Station, it is very doubtful in our mind if he would ever have become a canonized saint in the Catholic Church! In spiritual, as in temporal matters, men are judged by the company they keep, and when the Devil's Advocate would urge the objection against St. Simon Stylus that he had been under the care of the committee who drew up the report we are revising—poor St. Simon would have seriously suffered in character for keeping such company.

There is sufficient material in the extract we have made from the "very interesting paper" read by Dr. Macfarlane, to make its very instructive articles, which will contain some sage counsel and some historical information for our anti-Catholic medical friends, who will therefrom discover that the "dark ages" were not nearly as opaque as they appear to obtuse minds, nor was St. Simon Stylus by any means the lunatic the Sir Oracles of Agnew's Station would have the world believe.

Next week (D. v.) we will devote a couple of columns to the "Dark Age" phase of the subject, and in our subsequent issue we will exhibit the great St. Simon Stylus in his true character, so that additional interest may be given to Dr. Macfarlane's "very interesting paper" on "crazy" Catholic saints.

The Heroic Martyrs of Molokai.

By the steamer Zealandia, which sails for Honolulu to-morrow, there will leave the Pacific shore of America, for ever, a holy and courageous Catholic missionary whose memory we hope will be for ever kept green in the mind of every reader of the MONITOR. Rev. LAURENT CONSTANT, with whom our readers have already become acquainted as the noble-souled priest whose zeal for the salvation of souls has led him to volunteer to assist the martyr of Molokai, FATHER DAMIEN, in breaking the bread of life to the afflicted lepers who are shunned by all save these two valorous priests of the Catholic Church.

FATHER CONSTANT leaves behind him, for ever, relatives, friends, society, and all that serves to make life dear to the majority of mankind, in order to live amidst the leper villages for a number of years, as the servant of servants, then to contract the dread disease, linger a few years more or less while the corroding vires devour health, strength and leave one lying a wreck of humanity, then to smile at death, and then earn the perpetual palm of the martyr's victory in heaven!

How "foolish," and and unaccountable such an act seems to those who know nothing of the noble faith, who have been taught to worship Mammon as their sole God! Such persons cannot conceive how it is possible for a Catholic priest to unite himself for ever, merely that the sole of stricken strangers may be saved—to absorbed are they in following this whatever world that they forget the ability bestowed by Almighty God who gave His only Son as a sacrifice for man's Redemption. But every true disciple of Christ will remain in the self-sacrificing spirit of these two Catholic missionaries the God-given gift of Apostolic zeal which animates the souls of all who are truly devoted to the glorious cause of Christ, and who desire to share in the great work He inaugurated when His suffered an ignominious death on Calvary's Cross.

FATHER DAMIEN fully appreciates the immense sacrifice which FATHER CONSTANT has made in thus sharing with him his lifelong exile on this leper-colony island of Molokai. In one of his letters to his brother Benedictines in the holy cause of Charity, FATHER DAMIEN says: "The generous and complete sacrifice you have made of yourself has been accepted by Almighty God and by our beloved Bishop Hight Rev. Dr. Hermann Koeckemann. As for myself, I cannot express my feelings for the salvation of my poor lepers, who continue to arrive in great numbers (30 to-day) I dare to ery aloud to you with all my heart. Come without delay to my assistance to help and to replace me, for I am the only priest here, and, to tell you the whole truth, my health threatens to refuse me their use to celebrate Holy Mass, and that in a very short time."

For fourteen years FATHER DAMIEN has been the guide, the friend and the comforter of the suffering lepers of Molokai. He has built two churches, one in Kalawao and another in Kaulapapa, both of which he has attended himself. He has also established a school for leper children, and now, after fourteen years of association with the effect, the occupants of this Island, his terrible disease has insinuated itself into his system, and he lives in the dread of some day seeing his hands unfit to celebrate the Eucharistic sacrifice! What a terrible trial for a priest of God's Church! Microbes have also attacked in FATHER DAMIEN's ears and eyes, his eyelashes are affected, and it may be only a few months when his features will cease to be familiar to those who knew him in the world beyond the charnel-house of the living tomb!

And yet, gloomy as FATHER DAMIEN's present prospects are, dark as his earthly future may appear, there is to every true missionary of the Cross a silver lining which shines with heavenly splendor through the starky veil that hides the glory of God from human eyes. "All for God!" is inscribed upon the banner every martyr bears, and under such a Divine inspiration the highest aspirations of the Christian soul, and the most heroic sacrifices of the human will—are possible of performance.

FATHER DAMIEN has attended the death beds of nearly two thousand lepers during his residence in Molokai. He has also shared by a noble band of the Sisters of Charity of St. Francis, who voluntarily left their beautiful house in Syracuse, New York, in order to undertake the nursing of the thousands afflicted with the most loathsome disease known among the many ills to which human flesh is subject. What sublime testimony does not such heroism on the part of those holy Sisters bear towards the truth of the one holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, when these pure and beautiful servants of God's poor and afflicted belong! They follow in the service of their Benedictine Redeemer in the Infinite where contagion is constant and where their self-sacrifice is sure to end in the lingering death of leprosy! Here, indeed, may the Catholic Church say: "Behold what a victory God's faith can achieve over human pride, worldly vanity and self-will!"

And then, for a moment, let us be useless, and how cowardly sectarianism appears when it is brought into comparison with the supernatural heroism which priests and Sisters of Christ's only Church manifest when duty calls them to face contagion and death in order that souls may be saved for heaven! In such a contrast, every intelligent Christian can readily distinguish the true Church from the false sect. The true disciples of God sacrifice all worldly comforts and honors in order to serve God in the midst of repulsive sights and odors in voluntary exile, whilst the bleatings of sectarian dress in purple and fine linen, live in "reatured" society, and—like Dives of old—look down with scorn and contempt on those "foolish" Priests and Sisters who make the charnel-house of disease their daily habitation. We can only thank God that they can win Heaven at so small a sacrifice!

Archbishop Riordan in Chicago.

Through the kindness of Very Rev. Joachim Adam, V. G. of Monterey and Los Angeles, the MONITOR is in receipt of news from the Most Rev. Archbishop J. S. Alemany, D. D., who, our readers will deeply regret to learn, received the last rites of the church on the 8th ult., at which time his illness was generated through a very severe attack of brain fever. Father Adam promises to send us news of the condition of the venerable Archbishop from time to time. Meanwhile we ask the pious prayers of our readers for God's will in the critical case of one whom they all deeply revere.

We are indebted also to Rev. Father Harrington for a copy of the Spanish paper El Norte Catalan of April 7th, which gives the following account of the Archbishop's recent severe attack: "On Wednesday of Holy Week, Archbishop Alemany experienced a very severe cerebral attack which commenced at St. Joseph's Day while leaving confessions during the morning, in the Church of the Pillar, in Valencia. As the doctors feared a recommencement of the attack, they ordered the administration of the Holy Sacraments. Thanks to God, on Saturday of the same week there was a change for the better, which although very slow, continues. The same doctors hope that within a few days this illness (or stroke) will be able to leave his bed, although they do not think that he will regain his previous health. The whole city of Valencia which was expecting yesterday report no change."

A Word of Caution.

We caution our readers against putting any faith whatever in the calleganza from Rome published in the daily press every Sunday last. They are all manipulated in London and each of them bears transparent evidence of the falsy upon its face. The calleganza says that Catholics who belong to the Irish National League are to be debarred from absolution. And then it affirms this absurd contradiction "It is fortunate stated that the Irish National League not political aims are explicitly confessed by the Holy Office."

Another calleganza says that the majority of the Irish priests "have been from the National movement against their will. A flagrant falsehood which could only emanate from a London cockney. And the ignorant and malevous manufacturer of the crooked calleganza winds it up by saying "To deny the Infallibility of the Pope, who has acted with anything like precipitation or without the most careful inquiry, would subject Roman Catholics to the accusation of heresy." When the Irish Catholics become heretics, then indeed will the heavens fall! These calleganzas are concocted in London, a place notorious for the crime of lies that have emanated from it defaming the Irish people and calumniating the Catholic Church.

Feast of St. De La Salle.

The Holy Father has appointed May 15th as the Feast of St. De La Salle, the founder of the Christian Brothers, and on Friday last the Feast of this great servant of God will be celebrated for the first time in the chapel attached to St. Mary's College. At 7 o'clock in the morning there will be Mass and Communion; at 10 o'clock Solemn High High Mass, and Vespers in the afternoon. May 4th, 1888, was the day when the canons of St. De La Salle were deposited in the Church at Rouan, France.

— Patience is a virtue which every friend of Ireland should exercise under the present exciting crisis. Catholics, especially, should be cool, calm and collected, as the official documents from Rome will be printed in the course of a few weeks, and they will be found to be far different from what the enemies of Ireland and of the Church are representing them to be, in order to make capital against both the Church and the country which English Tories hate most cordially.

— Last Thursday the corner-stone of the new Convent School, built at the expense of the tax payers of Los Angeles, was laid by the Grand Lodge of Masons, a body of men who have no business whatever to be present in such a function. Masonry is an oath-bound secret organization condemned by the Catholic Church and objectionable for many reasons to a great many American citizens, and the parties who invited the Masons to act on the above occasion should be publicly censured.

CONTROVERTED POINTS ON CATHOLIC MATTERS.

3. Additional Testimonies Against the Historical Veracity of Leo's Statements and Figures Relative to the Spanish Inquisition.—Reluctance to be Borne in Mind in Dealing with the Present Subject. Concluding Remarks.

Few readers, even if only moderately acquainted with these pages since the dawn of day, can be said to ignore the world renowned productions of the distinguished Spanish author, James Balmes. These have been translated into the leading modern languages and have everywhere met with unprecedented success. But by far the most famous of his works are his Essays entitled. "European Civilization or Protestantism and Catholicity Compared in their Effects on the Civilization of Europe." It is precisely in this book that he treats in a masterly manner the question of the Inquisition in general and of the Spanish Inquisition in particular.

We warmly recommend the perusal of his three chapters bearing on our subject—chapters XXXV, XXXVI and XXXVII, and for the benefit of those who may not possess that valuable work, we here transcribe a note given in the Appendix, page 187, in which Balmes's claim to veracity is triumphantly displayed.

"In some of my works I have made the most notes with respect to this Institution, to Llorente, the author of a history of the Spanish Inquisition. The impartiality which may be expected from a writer who has made every effort in his book, which has evidently been written for the purpose of Inculcating the hatred of Spain, the Catholic clergy and the Holy See. Hispanophobia, which is the ruling passion displayed by his modern works, for any Catholic to place any reliance on the veracity of Llorente would be a great error. In fact, in every part of the project of the religious constitution of Spain, the author displays a hatred of the sciences, and introduces scheme and heavy jests against the Spanish Inquisition, which are the universal discipline established from the time of the Apostles, and which form the sacred repository of our holy religion, whose only end is the salvation of souls. This hatred and does not hold the best lover Hispanicus in check, but, on the contrary, it does credit when writing the history of the Inquisition, that he of every side of it in many appropriations of declaiming against the clergy and the Holy See, and of making use of impartiality. Perhaps, if the Inquisition in Madrid had sent relating the conduct of the Spanish Inquisition, and the Inquisition in Spain, and the effects made by the Holy See for the purpose of having the Inquisition in Madrid, the appeals which were made, and the merits of the Holy See, and the acts of many obtained at Rome; all these facts clearly showed that the Holy See, from the time of its rise, a member of country, was rather an idol than a friend to the Inquisition, and that it has been the cause of the difficulty. By saying, that when Cortes of Madrid wanted to carry money from to [illegible] to [illegible] the Holy See, the Inquisition, and the Inquisition in Spain, and the effects made by Breeding Over Ailments.

If you are sick or ailing, don't depend too much on the medicines you take or the remedies you take to effect a cure. Tonics and alteratives are of great use, but attention to the rules of hygiene, mental as well as physical, will make them more efficacious.

In the first place, don't give up too easily; have courage; assert your will power; don't brood over your aches and pains and symptoms, but try to forget them; and the chances are that you will forget them so thoroughly that when by accident you do remember them it will only be to wonder where they are. If the worst comes, and you must give up, then do so gracefully and thoroughly, keep hopeful, and so order all pertaining to your mind as well as your body, that the best results may be obtained from the remedies used.

Half the sufferings of nervous people come from brooding over their ailments until imagination gets the upper hand. Nine times out of ten all their symptoms would disappear if they would pay strict attention to their diet, have it light and nutritious, and avoid stimulants altogether—tea and coffee; baths daily, using friction with a brush or towel; take plenty of outdoor exercise, whether the weather be pleasant or not; and try to forget their nerves in pleasant reading or pleasant companionship—not exciting company, to irritate—or in congenial work; and if work they must and if it be not congenial, then let them do it "by God's law," thoroughly and conscientiously; and they will be astonished to find how the sun will seem bright, or the lay wind less cold, the ocean less irritating and their friends much pleasanter, when in reality it is all in themselves—they are only taking brighter views of life, and not ceaselessly irritating themselves and others around them.

What! Never?

There are some things a well bred young lady never does, says a writer on etiquette, and these are among them:

She never turns around to look after any one, when walking on the street.

She never takes supper or refreshments at a restaurant with a gentleman after attending the theatre unless they are very intimate acquaintances.

She does not wear her monogram around her person or stick it over her letters and envelopes.

She never accepts a seat from a gentleman in the street car without thanking him.

She never forgets her ball-room engagements or refuses to dance with one gentleman and immediately dances with another.

She never takes more than one glass of wine at a dinner or entertainment.

She never snubs other young ladies, even if they happen to be less popular or well favored than herself.

She never talks or laughs loudly in public places.

She never raises her lorgnet and tries to stare people she doesn't know out of countenance on the street.

She never wears clothing so singular or striking as to attract particular attention in public.

She never speaks slightingly of her mother and says she "does not understand" whether her behavior meets with maternal approbation or not.

A Cure for Cancer

Dr. Peter Hood, of London, is a communication to The Lancet, calls attention to an article published by him in the same journal some twenty years ago, on the value of calcium carbonate in the form of calcined oyster shells, as a means of arresting the growth of cancerous tumors. In the case which he then reported, that of a lady nearly eighty years old, the growth commenced ovary and left a healthy surface after a period of the remedy in question, at much as would lie on a shilling; taking taken every day in a little warm water or tea. He now reports another case of scirrhus in the breast, in the wife of a physician, in which the treatment was followed by an arrest of the growth and a cessation of the pain. The improvement having now lasted for years, and no extraordinarme having then the occurred. Dr. Hood says that the remedy can do no harm, and that the prima facie evidence in its favor is certainly strongerthan that on which rests the use of Chian turpentine, so eagerly resorted to by the profession. He would restrict the trials to well marked cases of sclirrus, and no longer it should be looked for in less than three months.

Apples and Pears.

Never before in the history of California were so many trees being planted, mostly prunes, apricots, peaches and oranges. Now many people have grown rich by doing what others neglected doing. Who is planting apples and pears? Is it a suggestive fact that, at this very time, these fruits are selling at prices ranging from $1 to $2 a box, these fruits, at least the winter varieties, are entirely for the upper hill where orange does not grow. At a height of 3000 or 4000 feet the apple has all the good qualities of the New England or Michigan apple, and some they do not have. Even an elevation of 1000 feet makes a different fruit. There are thousands of acres of such land in the mountains on both sides of this valley. Nothing can be better for winter apples or pears than the land where the redwood is a native. There are no more pests to contend with than with other fruits. All have to be cultivated and carefully watched.

Coffee and Tea

"How do you make coffee, and do you consider it beneficial?"

"I never boil it. I pour boiling water on it, let it filter, boil the water again and pour it over the grounds, and let it digest. Coffee is a precipitant—it aids digestion. To make tea as foul, boil the pots."

"How about tea?"

"To make good tea you must pour boiling water on it and take it out immediately. Then pour one third of the boiling water required, put the pot over a steamboat appearance, and let it stand another third, and finally the last one-third, repeating the steaming in order to let it draw without boiling. It is an actual stimulant.

Evolution of Words.

It is interesting to trace the evolution of words and expressions. Cultivated people say "How do you do?" Those who are less precise say, "Howdydo?" In the backwoods of Pennsylvania they say, "Howdy." The noble red man of the west says, "How" while the out on the farm says, "How."

—To clean bottles, put into them some kernals of corn and a tablespoonful of ashes; half fill them with water and after a vigorous shaking and rinsing you will find the bottles as good as new.

—Never use tea to clean tin, it will soon spoil it; make it shine with soap and water and rub with whiting, and it will look well and last longer.

—To clean silver—Use half pound of soft soda added to eight quarts of water; when at a boiling heat, dip the pieces of silver, and immediately wash in suspends, and wipe dry with a piece of cotton flannel. This method is recommended by one of the largest britannia works in New England.

Family Fun.

A New Year's Gift.

"James," he began as the clerk entered his private office. "The new year is clear ahead."

"Yes, sir."

"How long have you been with us?"

"Twenty years, sir.

"Twenty years. You came to from the country with all your worldly possessions tied up in a cotton handkerchief!"

"I did, sir."

"You left home determined to achieve success."

"Yes, sir."

"You believed that honesty and integrity would be rewarded, and that faithful service would meet its reward.

"That's the way I reasoned, sir.

"Ah! I remember the morning you applied for a situation. I liked your looks and the way you talked.

"Thank you, sir."

"Now, James, my partner goes out with the new year. I've been thinking of you."

"Yes, sir."

"Of your long and faithful service."

"Yes, sir."

"And I'm going to reward you. I'm glad it's in my power to do so. I shall commence the new year alone."

"Exactly."

"With limited capital."

"Ah!"

"And it will therefore be necessary to reduce all salaries. Up all the others I shall make a cut of 15 per cent. Owing to your long and faithful services, I shall make the cut only 10 per cent. That's all, James, and I hope you will try and get down half an hour earlier in the morning, and also be more economical with the gas and fuel."

She Saw the Point.

"That lady," said a Woodward avenue merchant, pointing to a woman who had traded about twelve dollars' worth in ten minutes, and was going out, "used to be one of my worst customers. She'd come in almost daily, bother four or five clerks for two hours, and go out without buying a cent's worth.

"How did you cure her?"

"Well, I spoke to her in an off-hand way one day and she fired up and said that for long as I kept clerks it was my business to be bothered. Next day I selected ten of the girl clerks, and they rung her door-bell at intervals of an hour all day and inquired if she wanted a screw girl. She didn't, and told them so pleasantly enough until the tenth one came. Then she said:

"I'd like to know why all you girls come here bothering me when I don't want to buy anything?

"Because, ma'am, so long as you keep servants in a poor business to be bothered," was the prompt reply.

"I think she reasoned out the analogy, for she now sits down and buys what she wants, and every clerk likes to wait on her."

Exchanging Experiences.

"My friends," said a man at an experience meeting in a Chicago suburb a few evenings ago, as he arose and looked about him with deep contrition. "I trust I have been a new life, and yet my conscience impels me to make a full confession before I can ask you to extend to me the hand of fellowship. For fifteen years before I came among you I was a manufacturer of maple syrup.

"My brother, there is hope for you!" exclaimed a man on the seat in front, as he rose and cordially grasped the speaker's hand. "I sold real estate for five years in Los Angeles."

"Brethren," exclaimed the minister, in a voice shoked with emotion. "Let us sing

"While the lamp holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return."

Excuse And Writing.

One day last week one of our young lawyers was asked by a neighbor to write a letter. After consenting, he said:

"What must I write?"

"Well, tell her your kind letter found us all well, and hope these few lines will find you enjoying the same blessing."

"What else?"

"Well, tell her we expect to make a good crop of rye and wheat, and will send fifteen acres in corn and cotton.

"Well, go on."

"Tell her John is married and has a nice wife. They live at the Mathews' place."

"Anything else?"

"I believe not; only tell her to excuse bad writing, and close."

Discriminating Charity.

"My dear," said Mr. Sparks to his wife, "if we give a new parlor carpet what will we do with the old one?"

"Put it in the library," said Mrs. Sparks promptly.

"Why, there is a carpet there," said Mr. Sparks, "what will we do with that."

"Put it in the spare room," said Mrs. Sparks decisively, "and give the spare room carpet to the poor. It is a hideous thing, anyway."

"Yes," said Mr. Sparks reflectively, "it is. We might give it to an asylum for the blind."

"A very good idea," said his wife approvingly. "And we will give the one in our room to an asylum for the deaf, it is so fearfully loud."

An After-Dinner Speaker.

"My good man," said the lady who had given the tramp a large plate full of victuals, "pardon me for making the suggestion, but would you not enjoy your repast fully as well, if not better, if you should follow the custom that has always prevailed in this household, and invoke a blessing on your food before you begin?"

"Madam," replied the hungry tourist, with his mouth full, "I'm and Chauncey Depew always does our best talkin' after we've eat."

Simple.

Some children are bright enough to discover the cross-cuts to knowledge at a very early age.

"What is a diamond?" asked a teacher.

"Carbon," replied the bright scholar.

"Yes, a diamond is pure carbon, but you must remember that coal is also carbon. That was taught in the last lesson."

"Yes'm."

"Now, how could you be sure to tell the difference between the two kinds of carbon?"

"Ask the price!" piped up a small boy.

Precious Letters.

Wife (to second husband who is rummaging in a close)—"Don't disturb that bundle of letters, John. I wouldn't have anything happen to them for the world."

Husband (fondly)—"Oh, dear, then you didn't burn those foolish love letters of mine after all, as you said you did?"

Wife—"Yes John, I burned them; but those letters are from your first husband."

A Woman's No.

Sympathetic Mother—Don't be cast down by the girl's first refusal. It doesn't mean anything. I refused your pa half a dozen times before I married him.

Son—Humph! I guess I won't try again.

"Why not?"

"Well, I suppose I might worry her into accepting me, but I don't want any such cold-dog life as you and pa lead.

CONTROVERTED POINTS ON CATHOLIC MATTERS.

[EXCLUDED FROM PICKETT PAGE.]

Ruler of the world was an insult to society itself, and they accordingly measured the punishment by what they considered the gravity of the offence in judging of the tent times, if we wish to be wise and fair, we must judge them not by our feelings and thoughts, and by our modern ideas and views, but according to the habits, customs, feelings and circumstances prevalent in those times. In these days, if a man is punished for rejecting the Faith, or even for insulting God in the great scandal and injury of his fellow-citizens, a fearful outcry is raised to protest against the sentence. Yet, when the French Communists took it into their head to reproduce the feats of the African Vandals of olden times, every one was loud in proclaiming that shooting would be too good for them. Is, then, a denial of the Faith, or blasphemy against God's Supreme Majesty, not a far worse crime than the pulling down and burning of public buildings or setting fire to the Tuileries? Verily, by maintaining the unity of the Faith the Roman See saved the world more bloodshed and spared it far more ruins than all the ruling monarchs have been able to erect by their palliative or even their coercive legislation.

Sixth. Even the Spanish Inquisition, notwithstanding all its errors and excesses, which we freely admit, and the cause of which we have already adduced, can say this much in its defence. The Spanish Government and all Europe in flames and all hands reeking with blood, wherever heresy and schism arose and the unity of Faith had been lost. The Pseudo War, the Thirty Years' War, the excesses of the Anabaptists; sedition in France; the cruelties that desolated the Netherlands; the wholesale butcheries in England, particularly under Henry VIII. and Elizabeth; the high handed measures, exiles, confiscations and murders with which the Catholic Faith was exterminated, root and branch, from the people of Sweden, Norway and Denmark; taught the other European Catholic nations lessons not to be easily forgotten. The Spanish rulers seeing this, determined to save Spain these and similar terrors, by preserving, at all costs, the unity of the Faith among that intensely Catholic people, and by stamping out and excluding from the realm even the first germs of the Protestant rebellion, which promptly smoke were taping to dissemination in the Spanish Peninsula. The Inquisition was the means devised for the purpose. How on we blame that tribunal for the death and tortures of a few obstinate heretics, when we see that thereby the whole of Spain was never even murmuring civil wars, and all the horrors that characterized the religious fanaticism of the sectarians of Northern Europe?

Seventh. A story is told of Sir Robert Walpole, that on one occasion, when his secretary proposed to read to him some work on history, he declined, saying that he preferred hearing something that was true, whereas history he knew to be false. His knowledge of the affairs of life, of the real motives and causes which led to public events, and of the way in which these events are described and accounted for in the works that are given forth to the world as histories, had led him to the general conclusion that all histories are false. Though we are willing to accept from this cynical judgment some honorable instances of faithful records of the past, yet we find ourselves compelled to subscribe to the common saying that, during the last three hundred years in particular, history has generally been one vast conspiracy against truth. The Protestant world calls Ecclesiastical History, when duly analyzed, is found, in most cases, to be a systematic attempt so to distort and misrepresent facts, as to bring discredit upon the Popes, the Catholic Church and her institutions. The Inquisition is a case in point. When Protestants have the word Inquisition, immediately there rises up before their eyes a horrible vision of a secret tribunal, whose headquarters are at Rome, but whose hands are every where; a tribunal, which shrinks from no measures either of fraud or violence in order to compass its ends, and whose one great aim is to sweep away Protestantism and Protestants from off the face of the earth. Now, granting that this was a true picture invented by the bigoted Monks and Friars of the Dark Ages to rob and murder all lovers of pure Gospel truth. The object of these pages, and of the article that is to appear next week, is to call our readers something of the real history of this much maligned institution, thereby to assist them in repelling the attacks so frequently hurled at the Church and her Supreme Pontiff, and this enable them to judge, from this instance, of the many other calumnous charges alleged by freethinkers and bigoted sectarians or ill-informed newspaper writers against the Catholic Faith.

When poorly informed or misled newspaper writers, drawing their knowledge from certain Encyclopedias, and composing their lucubrations under the pressure of time, are betrayed into mistakes like those, that we have recently exposed in the Monitor, they are likely to screen themselves from all responsibility on the plea that they did no more than follow, and that, at all events, they knew no better; rather a lame excuse in the mouth of those that pose as leaders of public opinion! Here we beg to remark that we should feel more inclined to believe them and accept their apology, whatever it be, if such editors had the manliness and honesty of retracting and acknowledging their unintentional blunders before that very public, whose they were instrumental in deceiving and misleading. But to do this requires some courage, a thing rather rare in our days. Then we beg, in sooth, reasonable to presume true that the misled has been done, and every one acquainted with the case here referred to, is firmly convinced that not only Christian charity, but even common, natural justice exact its reparation, whenever it can be, at least partially made, through the columns of the Press, and by reaching the same readers that have perused the obnoxious statements against the Holy See. Charity and justice of sentiment silence is golden, yet there are occasions in which it is rather premicious, and in which to speak out the truth, is, to say the least, more honorable. But want of space compels us to bring our remarks to a close.

Our chief, nay, our sole aim in writing the series of nine articles successively published in the Monitor, was, as we stated in the introduction, to defend the truth and correct misrepresentations of the enemy, anti-Catholic, one sided and unfruitful answers, contained in the query columns of our contemporary, the Morning Call, in the issues of February 19 and 26 of the current year. A few lines, it would appear, might have sufficed to contradict the false statements printed in that journal, but we are firmly convinced that the most effectual means of disposing of untruthful and groundless assertions is not only to pull down the flimsy fabric of misrepresentation, but also to dig out its very foundation, and build upon its ruins the stately edifice of truth. This we have honestly attempted to do—we leave it to our readers to judge of our success. We expect no favors and much less an attitude of defense from the secular press; but we think we have a right to claim at least fair play and impartial justice, and to see that our Church, her institutions and history, shall not be either maligned or misrepresented with impunity.

And let it be understood that whoever it shall come to our notice that either intentionally or otherwise, either through bigotry or ignorance, Catholic Truth and Catholic Facts are perverted, we will not fail to raise our voice and wield our pen, so long as it shall please God to make use of our poor efforts in the defense of His Holy Cause.

That Spurious Papal Document.

The letter which purported to have emanated from Pope Leo XIII., and which we published last week, appeared in the Atlas of this city on the 19th ult., and the Riverside Chronicle having asserted that it equal the document from the Atlas, led us to suppose that it first appeared in that paper and was endorsed by it. Upon this supposition we placed the Atlas and the Riverside Chronicle in the same anti-Catholic category. We have since discovered, however, that the Atlas is not responsible for spurious letter unreservedly condemned it by the following introductory editorial remarks:

"The Republican politicians are evidently feeling very uneasy in consequence of the activity and earnestness of the Prohibitionists, and the party organs are vainly trying to check the Prohibition movement by alternately abusive and coaxing lectures. The Sacramento Bee is virulent denunciation of Father John and other Prohibitionists, and the Democratic contemporaries, there is no perceptible disposition on the part of their Republican brethren to turn back from the Prohibitionists. This single fact is alarming the Republicans like the Spectre at the feast. A forged papal letter, purporting to be from the Pope, is being sent through the mails to Prohibitionists. While the forgery is a very clumsy affair, its intent is plain enough. It is meant to make Prohibitionists believe that the Pope and the Catholic Church are opposed to the Prohibition movement for purposes of their own. Of course Catholics will at a glance recognize the spurious character of the document, but it is not intended for Catholics at all. The letter will doubtless be treated with political contempt of a stronger different character—also sent secretly through the mails. A copy of the bogus "encyclical" received by a Methodist preacher in this town, is a well known Prohibitionist, is given below, verbatim et literatim.

We learn that several thousand copies of this diabolical document have been scattered all over this County by some designing and degraded individuals who have taken this method of raking up the Sewer filth spirit of intolerance against the Catholic Church, and we are glad to know that the Atlas is on the side of right and truth in this matter. We have no desire to censure any of our contemporaries unless they evince a prescriptive spirit towards the Church or Catholics. The reference made by the Riverside Chronicle mislead us in this matter, and we cheerfully give the Atlas the benefit of the fact so as to remove any false impressions our remarks last week might have formulated in the minds of our readers.

— Whilst Balfour's lazzuks are bastinadoing poor Erin by means of malicious subterfuges manufactured for the occasion, a Protestant world calls Ecclesiastical History, when duly analyzed, is found, in most cases, to be a systematic attempt so to distort and misrepresent facts, as to bring discredit upon the Popes, the Catholic Church and her institutions. The Inquisition is a case in point. When Protestants have the word Inquisition, immediately there rises up before their eyes a horrible vision of a secret tribunal, whose headquarters are at Rome, but whose hands are every where; a tribunal, which shrinks from no measures either of fraud or violence in order to compass its ends, and whose one great aim is to sweep away Protestantism and Protestants from off the face of the earth. THE WEEK'S NEWS —FROM— IRELAND.

IRISH NEWS BY MAIL.

Antrim.

On April 6th, the Northern Spinning and Weaving Mill, Belfast, one of the largest manufacturers in the North of Ireland, was offered for sale by public auction, but, as the bidding was the highest offer, the sale was withdrawn. Nearly one thousand operatives will be thrown out of employment in consequence of the stoppage of the mill.

The death is announced, on April 6th, of Mr. Patrick Reed, brother of the late Messrs. R. and D. Reed, the well known publishers of Belfast, and formerly proprietors of the Morning News. His brothers, the late Robert and Daniel Reed, by their many editions of the Sacred Scriptures, Catholic prayer-book and other religious publications, spread the knowledge of religion through all the divisions of the Christian family. Mr. Patrick Reed, jr., taught it by beautiful example. For a long time, even after he had retired, he was Honorary Secretary of that value, and he kept the accounts of that church until about three years ago.

Armagh.

On April 6th, a report reached Lurgan that Catholics proceeding from Derry to the sports at Derrytrasna, on the previous day, were stopped on the road by an organized mob of Orangemen and attacked with stones. The Orangemen opened fire, and it is thought that the sports were held in the interests of the Nationalists, for political purposes.

Cork.

A very fine statue of St. Patrick has been placed in a niche over the Doric column in front of Patrick's Church, Sunday. It was intended to have been erected yesterday, being the 1500th anniversary of his death, but a difficulty arose owing to the height it had to be elevated to, the niche being over 70 feet from the ground. The pedestal of the statue took an epoch to Dublin which, as well as many other Catholic churches, was under the auspices of the Very Rev. Canon McCarthy, P.P., V.G.

The remains of a relative to the Dean's brother-in-law, policy of Balfour, has been awaited to Cork. A few days ago the latter, of the poet murdered Lord Cavan, followed his son to the grave, the mourning funeral illness, brought on by the shock of his boy's tragic fate. It is only a few weeks since the cortège closed over the remains of his eldest daughter, whose death is attributed to the same cause. The two deceased were the only five deaths at the dinner at Michelstown, and the murderer was a Catholic homicide; but the wounds of his victim, a Protestant, were inflicted by a Protestant, who were unable to more accurate reports. As the extrinsic proceeded several Protestants soon were witnessed, and and Irish people dispossessed, and some stones in some instances brought, and the Mayor, on a bailiff, Cuffe, directed the landlord to aid in the short extemporaneous hovel watched the process of the immortalities around.

Clare.

A communication from the Rev. M. B. Corcoran, P.P., Lisdoonvarna, Co. Clare, contains a very sensible idea of the police barracks. A large fashion with the Protestant world calls Ecclesiastical History, when duly analyzed, is found, in most cases, to be a systematic attempt so to distort and misrepresent facts, as to bring discredit upon the Popes, the Catholic Church and her institutions. The Inquisition is a case in point. When Protestants have the word Inquisition, immediately there rises up before their eyes a horrible vision of a secret tribunal, whose headquarters are at Rome, but whose hands are every where; a tribunal, which shrinks from no measures either of fraud or violence in order to compass its ends, and whose one great aim is to sweep away Protestantism and Protestants from off the face of the earth. Tipperary.

In the hurling match between Tipperary and Galway for the championship of Ireland, Tipperary won, the score being 1 goal, 1 point, and 7 forfeit point to all.

Wicklow.

On April 24, in the Dominican Convent, Wicklow, Miss Stella Kavanagh, third daughter of Mr. Thomas Kavanagh, JP and Lady Kavanagh, Ballin, was solemnly received into religion under the name of Sister Mary de Salos.

RESULT OF ST. ANTHONY'S FAIR, EAST OAKLAND.

THE MONITOR.
WEDNESDAY, MAY 9, 1888

Poetry.

[For the Monitor.]

LEGEND OF MOUNT DIABLO.

After from Boston's fleeting shores,
A venturous dreamer came;
The dashing, dancing sea, that
Had set his soul afame;
Young Frazer! dared the noble band,
Unmoving, strong, and bold,
That toiled to woo the Western world,
And win its heart of gold.

Upon a verdant mountain side
He reared his humble home,
Nor tapestry nor his primitive walls
Leveled down with the moist and gnome;
No ceiling, no flooring, no
Their stalwart spoil had cast,
The mountain sward was his tapestry,
His vine was the mountain blast.

There hung in old baronial halls
Its reverse-pictured face,
Than wife and children that adhered round
The mountaineer's fire place.
Three times were all that life held dear,
His joy and his golden store;
Far than he loved all peril and strife,
And came to this distant shore.

Wan and foolish dreams awoke
When sunrise gilded
Aye—dreams so bright, that they lightened his heart
When thinking his daughter's curly hair;
Such dreams a father's blood refines;
So proud, so sensitive—and so
Such blissful hopes allured him to win
This Eldorado's gold.

Around this happy mountain home
There reved in merriest glee,
A not-brown lad and his golden-haired mate,
Like bird's and sky-plume,
No shade of care budimmed their eyes,
Nor even a cloud-fleck in sight;
No shadows flitted in darkness about,
To tell of the coming sight.

At length the pall of cruel Fate,
In terrible blackness hung;
The loving hearts of the parents were soon
To behold an angelic song.
An agony far worse than death
Their dreams and their spirits broke,
A memento of more terrible pow',
A darker sentence spoke.

Oh! death is not the direst fate,
Nor comes with the deepest gloom,
Some weary hearts find sweetest repose
Within the dreaded tomb;
For them with soft and resolute s'ar,
They lie in a blessed rest,
Their peaceful calm ne'er more disturbed
By any mawkisome guest.

The setting sun that fatal day,
Went down with his glowing smile,
The north and sky in their placid content,
Nor spoke of the woe and wile.
The stars came out and calmly stared
On mountain, vale and dale,
And shed their light on the desolate home,
Over lone stars the ever-dale.

The mother searched from place to place,
And called in her loving voice;
Hunted amount, which was peculiarly his own,
To make her heart rejoice.

All round about, again, again,
She searched in her anxious mood,
Ran from the wandering mother could find,
Self-reliant, and good.

Which, heart bound down to frantic grief
Relief from the tearing pain.
No children born home returned
To calm her mother-fears,
Her pent up soul found a blessed release
In a pitying stream of tears.

But love new hope and vigor lent,
No pause in the home was found;
So out again to the wearisome task
Of a Husband's Lesson.

A Domestic Story Founded on Fact.

"I wonder why he stays so late?"
The woman who uttered these words had repeated them a hundred times since the autumn sunset in which she first sat down behind the window to watch and listen for her husband's coming, and it was quite dark
now, and still she pressed her soft cheek to the casement and peered into the shadows
with clear, blue eyes.

She was very beautiful and very young.
But for the wedding ring upon her hand
you would have called her a girl, and have believed her to be waiting for a lover's, and not a husband's, coming. Yet she had been married three long years, and he, to whom she had given all her heart when she could hardly hum at the altar, already neglected
her, and left her to watch evening after evening, night after night, for his lately fortunes when, in the old days of courtship
had been the very echo of her own.

Something akin to regret was in her heart
to night as she remembered, as only a wife loved with can, the love and tenderness of those past years, and how he used to gaze on her eyes, and sing to her, and bring her flowers and books and music!

Why had he changed! Was it her fault!
The tears would come to the blue eyes now
and she was wiping them away when the light of a lamp fell upon the ceiling through the half-open door, and in another moments
a tall, broad-shouldered woman, a servant
evidently, entered the room.

"In the dark again," she muttered, "and crying, too. It's a shame—that's what it is —a burning shame! Such a pretty young critter, and to make an idiot of her!
And then, setting down the lamp, she added,
aloud: "Come ma'am, come to dinner.
You know as well as I do that Mr. Powell won't be here for hours and hours, and this wrong of you to injure your health in this way. Do come down."

The young wife arose in obedience to the summons of the old servant—for Hugh had been her nurse when she was a child and was a privileged person, and not without some influence—and followed her doctress to the dining-room, where the snowy cloth was spread with every tempting
delicacy of the season, and where everything
from the coal mirror between the windows
to the ample one seconds standing near the fire glittered like polished silver.

"It is not because his home is cheerless,"
she said again, and the thought gave her a little comfort.

She sat down, and as she ate she listened to every sound in the street without. The wind was rising, and now and than some arm gale, or some unfastened shutter was flung to with a violent clang. But through all she soon heard a light, quick step upon
the pavement.

"Ah, mama, you were wrong," she said,
with a bright smile. "Here he is.

Nurse shook her head and chided down
the words. "The first time in three months,"
which she felt compelled to utter.

The door opened and a handsome, well built man, with soft, brown whiskers, and hair that had a golden gleam upon its darkness when it caught the light, came into the dining-room.

"I am sorry I did not wait for you,
Harry," began his wife, "but nothing is cold
yet, I hope, and—

"Oh, it will right. I'm glad you didn't wait," said the husband in a careless, off-
hand manner, which was peculiarly his own,
and which had a singular charm about it.
"Go on with your dinner, Rose. I'll help myself."

And so he did, eating with a hearty appetite, and talking all the while about nothing, chiefly about the weather.

It was like old times, Rose thought, as her cheek reddened and her chonky smiled
mirrorlight.

"He loves me still," she said to herself.
"Oh, I am sure of it! Dear Harry! he loves me still!

And so, when they were in the parlor,
alone together, she put her hand upon his arm as he stood before the fire, and said to him softly: "Harry, you'll not be angry with me if I say something to you—something that was in my heart as I sat waiting for you by that window an hour ago?"

"Angry with you, Rose? I'm answered, with, no."

And he passed his arm about her waist,
and drew her closely to him.

"I thought," she went on, "I thought,
Harry, while I sat there, of our old lover walks, and of the winter evenings we spent together, when neither for a moment were weary of each other; and then—for I was lonely and a little tired—I thought you did not care to be with me as you did then, and that you had grown tired of me, and I had made my my mind to ask you if it was so,
and if it were, why! Oh, Harry! if there are any faults or failings in me that turn your heart from me tell me of them, that I may mend them and win it back again. If
I unconsciously do aught to anger you, let me know it and I will be all you wish from that very moment. only, Harry, do not let one feel your heart estranged. Now, when I send poetry so much, love and Harry—just as you did when I was a girl."

And the tears could be restrained no longer, but poured themselves out upon his bosom, for he held her closely there, and spoke in a passionate, remorseful way, that almost frightened her. Part of what he said was so cold that she could not comprehend.

A spectral form in the mellowing light
Was striking to yield shape.

She followed it till sick and faint,
She stopped in her aching pain;
"Why should I follow! if thou followest me not,
Turn never shall see them again!"
The hollow voice, like magic spell,
Renewed her failing strength,
The breeze followed her mystic guide,
Straight on through the weary length.

Her tattered once her blouse in a thorn,
Her petticoat torn in a bush,
Yet pulling down to the rocky cleft,
The form of the mystic shape.
Behold that rock and the cleft in it
Thy beautiful children thrown
Far from the cleft—and the mysterious form
And pierced the shadowy air.

She turned to speak; the form was gone;
She stood on the hollow alone;
The night winds taped with her streaming hair,
Bestowing her hearts and moan.
Once more the rocky cleft she sought
In pleasure, and fear and dismay,
The spectral form in the opening stood,
Her children within his arms.

The frantic mother loudly called,
And beckoned with eager hand,
But vain appeal! they could not return,
Nor break from the spectral bands;
The mocking laugh from Demon bold
Was heard on the hollow alone;
As out of sight in the mountain's side
He vanished for evermore!

Years soon went searching far and wide,
For many a weary day,
But never more saw the children or fond,
And reluctantly turned away.
The parents around the rocky cleft,
Far back in the dark recess,
Their lost of Hope and ambitious dreams—
All wrecked on the Hidden Sand.

A Husband's Lesson.

A Domestic Story Founded on Fact.

"I wonder why he stays so late?"
The woman who uttered these words had repeated them a hundred times since the autumn sunset in the window to watch and listen for her husband's coming, and it was quite dark
now, and still she pressed her soft cheek to
the casement and peered into the shadows
with clear, blue eyes.

She was very beautiful and very young.
But for the wedding ring upon her hand
you would have called her a girl, and have believed her to be waiting for a lover's, and not a husband's, coming. Yet she had been married three long years, and he, to whom she had given all her heart when she could hardly hum at the altar, already neglected
her, and left her to watch evening after evening, night after night, for his lately
fortunes when, in the old days of courtship
had been the very echo of her own.

Something akin to regret was in her heart
to night as she remembered, as only a wife
loved with can, the love and tenderness of those past years, and how he used to gaze on her eyes, and sing to her, and bring her flowers and books and music!

Why had he changed! Was it her fault!
The tears would come to the blue eyes now
and she was wiping them away when the light of a lamp fell upon the ceiling through the half-open door, and in another moments
a tall, broad-shouldered woman, a servant
evidently, entered the room.

"In the dark again," she muttered, "and crying, too. It's a shame—that's what it is —a burning shame! Such a pretty young critter, and to make an idiot of her!
And then, setting down the lamp, she added,
aloud: "Come ma'am, come to dinner.
You know as well as I do that Mr. Powell won't be here for hours and hours, and this wrong of you to injure your health in this way. Do come down."

The young wife arose in obedience to the summons of the old servant—for Hugh had been her nurse when she was a child and was a privileged person, and not without some influence—and followed her doctress to the dining-room, where the snowy cloth was spread with every tempting
delicacy of the season, and where everything
from the coal mirror between the windows
to the ample one seconds standing near the fire glittered like polished silver.

"It is not because his home is cheerless,"
she said again, and the thought gave her a
little comfort.

She sat down, and as she ate she listened to every sound in the street without. The wind was rising, and now and than some arm gale, or some unfastened shutter was flung to with a violent clang. But through all she soon heard a light, quick step upon
the pavement.

"Ah, mama, you were wrong," she said,
with a bright smile. "Here he is.

Nurse shook her head and chided down
the words. "The first time in three months,"
which she felt compelled to utter.

The door opened and a handsome, well
built man, with soft, brown whiskers, and
hair that had a golden gleam upon its darkness when it caught the light, came into the dining-room.

"I am sorry I did not wait for you,
Harry," began his wife, "but nothing is cold
yet, I hope, and—

"Oh, it will right. I'm glad you didn't wait," said the husband in a careless, off-
hand manner, which was peculiarly his own,
and which had a singular charm about it.
"Go on with your dinner, Rose. I'll help myself."

And so he did, eating with a hearty appetite, and talking all the while about nothing, chiefly about the weather.

It was like old times, Rose thought, as her cheek reddened and her chonky smiled
mirrorlight.

"He loves me still," she said to herself.
"Oh, I am sure of it! Dear Harry! he loves me still!

And so, when they were in the parlor,
alone together, she put her hand upon his arm as he stood before the fire, and said to him softly: "Harry, you'll not be angry
with me if I say something to you—something that was in my heart as I sat waiting
for you by that window an hour ago?"

"Angry with you, Rose? I'm answered, with, no."

And he passed his arm about her waist,
and drew her closely to him.

"I thought," she went on, "I thought,
Harry, while I sat there, of our old lover
walks, and of the winter evenings we spent together, when neither for a moment were weary of each other; and then—for I was lonely and a little tired—I thought you did not care to be with me as you did then, and that you had grown tired of me, and I had made up my mind to ask you if it was so,
and if it were, why! Oh, Harry! if there are any faults or failings in me that turn
your heart from me tell me of them, that I may mend them and win it back again. If
I unconsciously do aught to anger you, let me know it and I will be all you wish from that very moment. only, Harry, do not let one feel your heart estranged. Now, when I send poetry so much, love and Harry—just
as you did when I was a girl."

And the tears could be restrained no
longer, but poured themselves out upon his bosom, for he held her closely there, and spoke in a passionate, remorseful way, that almost frightened her. Part of what he said
was so cold that she could not comprehend.

A spectral form in the mellowing light
Was striking to yield shape.

She followed it till sick and faint,
She stopped in her aching pain;
"Why should I follow! if thou followest me not,
Turn never shall see them again!"
The hollow voice, like magic spell,
Renewed her failing strength,
The breeze followed her mystic guide,
Straight on through the weary length.

Her tattered once her blouse in a thorn,
Her petticoat torn in a bush,
Yet pulling down to the rocky cleft,
The form of the mystic shape.
Behold that rock and the cleft in it
Thy beautiful children thrown
Far from the cleft—and the mysterious form
And pierced the shadowy air.

She turned to speak; the form was gone;
She stood on the hollow alone;
The night winds taped with her streaming hair,
Bestowing her hearts and moan.
Once more the rocky cleft she sought
In pleasure, and fear and dismay,
The spectral form in the opening stood,
Her children within his arms.

The frantic mother loudly called,
And beckoned with eager hand,
But vain appeal! they could not return,
Nor break from the spectral bands;
The mocking laugh from Demon bold
Was heard on the hollow alone;
As out of sight in the mountain's side
He vanished for evermore!

Years soon went searching far and wide,
For many a weary day,
But never more saw the children or fond,
And reluctantly turned away.
The parents around the rocky cleft,
Far back in the dark recess,
Their lost of Hope and ambitious dreams—
All wrecked on the Hidden Sand.

The mother's heart soon crazed to moan;
It broke, though years strong and brave;
Beneath the shine of her Scotland home
She rests in an early grave.
When found our Sandie's happy glow,
This legend we off recount,
Of the place where they had vital day,

A LEGEND OF THE RHINE.

A Broken Heart and a Creeping Vine.

Once upon a time there lived beside the Rhine a beautiful young lady. She had a lover also lived her, and a lover she loved in turn. But, after he had sworn her not only one year, but three—he asked her to marry him, and she, anxious to show her love, said, "Wait

Wait! he waited three years, he said, but at point holding, I will wait once more just one year.

Then he went away and became a soldier, and years of his absency filled the hand, but the lady was prized by the thought that he had been able to leave her even for a year, and then he returned with laurels and remain home, though all the while the loved him well.

He knelt at her feet and took her hands in his, and said

"Lady, I have come back to claim you as my wife.

"Wait longer, a patient water is not a loser.

"I will wait ten years longer, he said, calmly. "If I do not, those will as well have been to left behind. Wait, lady! that he would plead for her, and that she would be forced to change her mind. But the maid passed, and with the return of his old self came a remembrance of those black eyes and red lips, those tender glances and bold professions of affection. Good, beautiful flower, gone same in comparison, and with the timepiece told the hour of II he started to his feet.

"Go to bed, Rose, he said. "I have a business appointment to night that I had forgotten. I will be back as soon as I can.

"A business appointment at this hour of the night! Rose was surprise.

But he had gone before she could put her thoughts into words, and, still full of her new found happiness, she went upstairs to her own white-curtained chamber. Harry had been up before her, and had changed his dress, leaving his every day garments lying untidily about. As she picked them up a paper fluttered from his vest pocket—a fold of paper, perfumed with musk. She opened it with a strange, aching of the heart, and read her wicked rival's note.

She did not scream or tear her hair as many would have done, but with a low moan she sat down upon the carpet, rocking herself to and fro. "So this was the friend of the neglect—of his remorseless self-reproach tonight. A worthless woman, who could make such an appointment—a creature beyond contempt or hate! She, true and pure as she was, was slighted for so foul a thing.
"I will confront them, she muttered.

"I will see him once more, and never again all day life. I will ask him how he crushed worm can turn. I will be a miserable man no longer!

And with these words, uttered in a hard, voice, which did not seem her own, and with a face so changed that no one would have recognized it, she donned her hood and cloak, and stole into the darkness of the night.

On she went toward the city, a slender figure hending beneath its weight of woe.
She heeded nothing and glided on and stood stood opposite the window of her husband's house, and saw the glare of lamplight through an aperture in the closed shutters.
Then Rose uttered one sharp cry of strength, tried the door, found it open, and went in.

In the meanwhile Harry Powell had reached the rendezvous early, and had waited some moments before the figure of cloaked and hooded woman came up the dark grass walk and stood beside him. She was veiled so that he could not see her features, but he knew that she was fearful of discovery, and did not wonder that it should be so.

"Signed," and she answered in a stifled voice, "I have come—watched—Mrs. heard.

And Harry led the way in and lit the gas.
The woman seemed frightened still, for she crouched down upon a bale of goods, with her veil upon her face and her hand within her bosom.

"We are alone now," and Harry, in a gallant tone. "Let me see your face, my sight! You cannot imagine how I long to meet those eyes?

Something, which might have been either a sob or a laugh, came from beneath the woman's veil. She whispered again: "Are these shutters closed? See, will you?

Harry turned to look at them. It was but a moment; but in that brief space of time he felt a heavy hand on his throat and saw a cloak and bonnet lying on the floor.
A stalwart ruffian, with a pistol in his hand, stood over him, and he saw that he had been duped.

"Aha!" muttered the coarse voice of the man—"aha, my fine gentleman! I have braces did you? My Lizzie has played her part bravely. You've opened the door for us, and shall open the safe, and shall never live to tell of it, either! The voice of Lizzie was in love with you and was a rich lady, did you? Ha, ha, you poor fool!"

There was a desperate struggle, but Harry was unarmed, and in a little while he lay prisoner on the floor, with the ruffian's pistol at his breast. It was all over. He gave one bitter thought of his own folly.
Rose was dead to him. Then the marauder's voice caused him to open them again in wild amazement, to see the robber sensation on the floor and his wife—his fair slender wife—standing over him with a billet of wood in her hand. She had saved him. And in his penitence and shame he fell at her feet, as one might fall before a sacred shrine.

He never forgot it. He never betrayed the sweet forgiveness she accorded him in his humiliation; and though they are old people now, with grandchildren about them, she still watches for him in the twilight,
and never watches long.

Profaning the Holy Name.

Is it not a terrible thing to think of this frequency with which so many thousands, every day, upon every little annoyance, use the most Holy Name of Our Lord by way of cursing and swearing! It is one of the most deplorable vices of our time. And is not only the vulgar and wicked who do this, many who ought to know better fall into this abominable habit.

In a number of dioceses, both in England and our own country, in order to counteract the prevalence of this shameful sin, and to guard the young especially from falling into the habit, associations have been formed, the members being all pledged against any profane use of the Holy Name. We trust these societies will spread and flourish.

In this connection we happen, just now,
to know of a young man who, from the infinity and absurdity of the habit, set forth in following cruel—

"I won't pick you up when you fall
I won't light your cigar when your has match gone out.

I won't mend a lamp chimney when you let it fall.

I won't change 1867 at the top of your letter into 1868

It won't make your correspondence shine
some one else.

I won't keep the nails in your boots from running into your feet.

It won't shake off the shovelful of snow that has landed on you from some roof

It won't make a train come back for you when you are one minute and thirty seconds late.

It won't cause your shirts any to make you to stop laughing when you fall down with a bundle of wood

"It is the lady when her lover bade to wait forever. In this form she is creeping toward his castle slowly but surely. So she will keep on till she reaches the heart she longs for.

Generations have passed from earth. The castle is a ruin, covered with ivy, and the peasants will tell you that it has crept there from the lady's grave, yonder, by the cross stone and rock, through the graveyard and over aisles and lofty towers. You can trace it if you choose, they say, but you do not try.

Solomon's Judgment in Chinese.

Two women came before a mandarin in Chinese dress, claiming to be the mother of a little child they had brought with them. They were so eager and positive that the mandarin was sorely puzzled.
He retired to consult with his wife, who was a wise and clever woman, and the queen was held in great repute in the neighborhood.

"Bring me a pair of scissors," said the lady, "and I will settle the matter.

"Bring me the infant," she said, "and I will show you how to divide it so that each may have an equal share

A Little Light on the "Dark" Ages.

Ignorant non-Catholics may justly be compared to talking parrots, for the reason that they can only repeat what they have heard from others, without being able to give a single reason for any expressions they may be able to make use of. Professional preachers, sectarian school teachers, anti-Catholic writers, and all vicious-minded vessels of error, have, for hundreds of years, been dinning into the ears of the youth of all lands the cry: "Dark Ages," "Dark Ages." As a natural consequence some Catholics themselves have been led to blush for the blackness of the earth during the so-called "Dark Ages," which twist for ingenuity depicted as the darkest spot in the world's history, and all of which was caused by the Catholic Church permitting the lamp of literature to become extinguished, that people are generally in the darkness of ignorance themselves, or else they have read only anti-Catholic works on the "Dark Ages," and as they look only through a smoked glass every object looks as black as night to their deceived vision.

Of course it stands to reason that the people who occupied the portion of the world which was inhabited from the eighth to the twelfth century, did not possess the vast affluence of art we do in the nineteenth century. They had neither steam power nor compressed air; the printing press nor the electric current. Railways and steamboats were unknown, telephones and the telegraph system had not yet been invented. In all such matters the speech known as the "Dark Ages" was completely in the dark; but claim that the people of the Christian world from the eighth to the twelfth century, were just as good, as moral, as virtuous and as faithful to God's ordinances as any portion of the earth's population, from the first dawn of Christian faith on earth down to this era of the world when men sacrifice themselves on the altar of materialistic advancement, without ever giving a single thought to the Creator who gave them all they possess.

Non-Catholics seem to have come to the conclusion that because some kings and high-born nobles could not write their names during the so-called "Dark Ages," the blame lies with the Catholic Church for keeping the people in ignorance. Yet the half-dozen examples quoted by her enemies prove that ignorance was general among the people, as truthful history has well established the contrary fact. It is even asserted by some anti-Catholic writers like Robertson, that some priests could not read the Breviary in the "Dark Ages." This fiction, however, is merely a flimsy falsehood fabricated out of whole cloth, as documentary evidence drawn from the Councils of the Church is extant, and which goes to prove that such ignorance on the part of priests in the Middle Ages of the Church was simply impossible.

It must ever be borne in mind that for centuries the Church struggled single-handed against Emperors, Kings and Princes, in order to release the people from the slavery into which they had been plunged by their rulers. And when she had gained a share of freedom for these serfs, then it was that she turned her attention to teaching them the necessary rudiments concerning both the world to come and the world they inhabited. Whilst slavery existed amongst the colored race in the Southern States, the Catholic Church could do hardly anything for the souls of that degraded race. And why? Because the Protestant owners of the slaves would not permit Catholic priests to instruct their bondsmen and bondswomen in the true faith. Hence the colored people became largely belonged to the Baptist, Methodist and other shouting sects wherein the man or woman who could shout "glory!" "glory!" loudest, was considered the nearest to God!

Now, however, since the shackles have been removed from the backs of the African race in America, and the Catholic Church has "a fair field and no favor," a most wonderful change has come over, the religious complexion of the colored race. Catholic missionaries are meeting with most gratifying success in establishing schools for the colored children and even the adults of the colored race. Catholic churches now dock sections of the South where the Sign of the Cross was never seen prior to ten or twenty years ago. Communities of Catholic Colored Sisters have thriving schools in several of the Southern States, and thus the civilizing influences of true Christianity are making a vast change in a race that hitherto only knew God as "the great Massa" of roaring, ranting, rip-and-tearing Methodist Camp meetings, or as "the Holy Hallelujah" of Baptist orgies which were bordered on their boundaries by blasphemous incantations.

Precisely in the same way had the Catholic Church to fain her time in past ages with respect to educating the people countries before Protestantism brought doubt, discord and spiritual death into the world. Slavery, ignorance and sensuality had to be annihilated before freedom and Christian knowledge could assert themselves. But the moment the Church saw her way clear to elevate the people, then her monks opened wide the doors of their every dominion, and education became as free and as general as the air the people inhabited. Schools and colleges abounded in every country in Europe and the East. Rome, Alexandria, Milan, Carthage and all the great cities of the world known to the people of the Middle Ages, had schools which were world wide in their celebrity. In the earlier centuries the monks of Ireland had established a school at Lindisfarne in England; they had also founded the monastery and school of Bobbio in Italy, of Verdun in France, and of Wurtzburg, Retisbon, Erfurth, Cologne and Vienna in Germany—to say nothing of the numerous institutions of learning they founded throughout their own land, as well as in other portions of the countries mentioned.

Whoever has read the history of the Middle Ages, or the "Dark Ages" of Protestant illiterates, need not be told of the thousands of students who attended Oxford and Cambridge, Cologne and Bec, Padua and Bologna, not to mention a hundred other equally memorable institutions that gave literature and religious knowledge with no niggarding hand to the youth of the ages called "Dark" by those who willfully blindfold themselves and their proclaim that the sun has lost its light!

It was the Catholic Church that created the great English Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, the former of which, during the reign of Henry II. of England, counted thirty thousand students! In attention in most of the schools of the Middle Ages was entirely free. Teachers in those "Dark Ages" did not work for salaries but for the salvation of souls. They spurned earthly dross and worked solely for God. In this respect they must be considered very "dark" indeed when viewed from the money grasping standpoint of some of our nineteenth century Christians! Bishops, Kings and Emperors left immense legacies of land and money for the support of free schools for the poor, and one Pope actually was "dark" enough to send more than a thousand students at different academies, supplying them also with books! The name of this Pope was Pelagius II. He was elected as one of the successors of St. Peter just eight hundred years ago.

Non-Catholics never tire of boasting and bragging about what they call "our" public schools, as if Catholic citizens had no share therein. It will, no doubt, surprise the Medical Faculty at Agnew's Station to learn that five schools were founded by the Catholic Church fifty-five hundred years before Luther let himself fall into the sewer of Catherine Hora. Where would five schools be in this nineteenth century only for the millions of the peoples' money which is expended in supporting them? Everybody, from the Director down to the door mat shaker must have high salaries, and when any outstanding attempt is made to reform educational earthquake occurs! It was not so in the much called "Dark Ages." The ragged Irish Catholics taught—at they do now in the Catholic free parochial schools—on a religious dole—without hope of fee or reward save that which God has promised when He says to those who instruct many to justice shall shine like stars for all eternity.

Whilst the Church of God was busy educating her children at home, during that era of the world which the medicos of Agnew's Station designate the "Dark Ages," she was also making the light of Christian faith shine with lustrous refulgence throughout the outside and almost unknown portions of the world. Thus from the opening of the ninth century to the close of the twelfth century the Sclavonic races were converted from the darkest and most repulsive paganism to Christianity, by some of those ecclesiastical celebrities whom Dr. Macfarlane, the Demosthenes of Jersey in the "Dark Ages," "crazy." The Bulgarians were also brought into the fold of Christ by another "crazy" saint. The Moravians, Bohemians, Danes, Swedes, and Germans were taught to know, to love, and to serve God by other "crazy" saints. St. Ansgar was "crazy" enough to found Oxford University about a thousand years before these medical critics of the Catholic Church made their headquarters at Agnew's Station.

Nor was it in teaching the youth of Europe alone that the Catholic monks and the other priests of the "Dark Ages" at the medicos of Agnew's Station spent their lengthy lives. These "crazy" Catholic divines were actually "foolish" enough to undertake to write copies of the whole Bible upon parchment, and to spend many years on the task! Upon the theory of Dr. Macfarlane every such learned man must have been a loose lunatic who ought to have been caged in some Asylum for idiots. These "crazy" were the priests of the Catholic Church to preserve the Bible, that hundreds of them were engaged during the "Dark Ages" in writing, imparting, correcting and embellishing the book then known as the "Sacred Scriptures," a correct copy of which, we imagine, none was seen inside the asylum at Agnew's Station. Other "crazy" monks in the "Dark Ages" were engaged in having down forests, erecting massive structures which still stand to immortalize their "foolish" builders, and in other works which transformed the face of Europe, and which covered a wilderness with a hundred cities. Ah! verily: The "crazy" Catholics of the "Dark Ages" could add Wisdom in any quantity required to the captious, peevish and snapish critics of this nineteenth century, who think themselves giants in intellect when they are mere pygmies in that knowledge which is most appreciated by Christian men. It is easy enough to cry "fool! fool!" when those to whom this term of opprobrium is applied, have been dead a thousand years, but Dr. Macfarlane and his miserable concurrers of the Catholic Times and Daily Monitor discovered ere this that there is still a power within the Church to which these "crazy" persons bow in humble, yet, to the medicos of Agnew's Station experience the sensation that all the fools in the Asylum for the Chronic Insane are not comprised in the patients above, and the sooner the Faculty are brought before the Commissioners of Insanity for mental examination, the better will it be for their medical reputation.

In the tenth century, Saints Adalbert, Bruno, Poppo, Sigefrid and other "crazy" saints of the Catholic Church, carried the faith of Christ to the nations of the Hungarians, the Prussians, the Poles, the Polish Russians, the people of Denmark, Holstein and Sweden. In the eleventh century Saints Ulfred, Eskill, Eudace and their equally "crazy" companions spread the light of Christianity among the Swedes, Norwegians, Russians, Moravites and Greek Schismatics.

In the twelfth century Saints Otho, Henry and other equally "crazy" Catholic missionaries, preached Christ Crucified and subsequently converted the people of France, and of Wart

Farm and Home.

How and When to Eat.

Never eat food when not needed, simply to satisfy, for in doing so it is twice wasted. It is thrown away in the stomach, as it has not transformed into health and strength, but becomes a source of disease and suffering. It had better be thrown upon the land for manure in the form of vegetation.

Never eat at bed-time, nor when very much exhausted, nor in great haste, for in so doing the seeds of dyspepsia are easily sown. If you have not time to eat a fair meal properly, you will gain by eating just what you can eat in an intelligent way, taking it so moderately that it may be well chewed and mixed with saliva, so that it may be digested, as that only is of any importance in the formation of health and strength.

Never harbor the absurd idea that the richer your food is in grease, spices, sweets and the like, the more nourishing it will be; for the plainer food contains the most available nourishment, bread being the "staff of life." The complicated dishes are often so difficult of digestion, that even less strength is obtained from them than from one half the quantity of plain and substantial food, while some kinds of so-called rich foods exhaust more strength—in the vain attempt to digest them—than they can afford, making an actual loss.

Never hurry unnecessarily, or attempt more labor than you can perform, unless sure of having ample time in the future to rectify errors, or be sick.

Never eat between meals, not even of fruits, if you are at all troubled with indigestion, or are not willing to become a dyspeptic at some time. No amount of hard work will justify lunches, as the stomach cannot digest food when taken so irregularly, nor will dispose of more than three meals a day.

Never take ice-water or ice-water at your meals, or destroy the digestion of them—within four hours after taking them—when satisfied that a "cold dinner" will prove unfavorable to your case, as ordinary food is never half so cold as those articles.

The Home Doctor.

For children there is nothing better than saffron tea for teething and fever.

Nothing better can be applied to a severe cut or bruise than cold water; it will give instant relief.

Lime water is good for chilblains. Use strong and hot. A saturated solution of alum in water, used hot, is also a curative.

For earaches take a bit of cotton-batting, put upon it a pinch of black pepper, gather it up and tie; dip in vinegar and insert in the ear. Put a flannel bandage over the head to keep it warm. It will give immediate relief.

Any kind of a bath, or any other process that will induce a general perspiration, and thus bring about a reaction, will cure a cold. Simply inhaling fresh air largely, by deep respiration, is sufficient to nip an incipient cold in the bud.

For a cough boil one ounce of flaxseed in a pint of water, strain, and add a little honey, one ounce of rock candy, and the juice of three lemons; mix and boil well. Drink as hot as possible.

Turpentine in almost a sure remedy for croup. Saturate a piece of flannel with it, and put it on the chest, and in severe cases three or four drops on a lump of sugar may be taken inwardly.

An excellent salve for bruises is the following: Take the leaves of catnip and bruise them with salt pork in a mortar, or with a rolling pin. If applied to flesh wounds or bruises of any kind, it will at once allay the inflammation.

The mixture of the yolk of an egg and glycerine is said to be an excellent remedy for burns. Put equal parts of each into a bottle and keep tightly corked. It will last for some time if put in a cool place.

Healthfulness of Lemons.

When people feel the need of an acid, if they would leave vinegar alone and use lemons or sour apples, they would feel just as well satisfied and receive no injury. And a suggestion may not come amiss at a good time when lemons are cheap in the market. A person should, in those times, purchase several dozen at once and prepare them for use in the warm, weak days of spring and summer, when acids or lemons and ripe fruits are so grateful and useful. Press your hand on the lemon and roll it back and forth briskly on the table, to make it yield as more easily; then press the juice into a bowl or tumbler, never lie to him; strain out all the seeds as they give a bad taste. Remove all the pulp from the peel and boil in water—a pint for a dozen pulps—to extract the acid. A few minutes boiling is enough; then strain the water with the juice of the lemons; put a pound of white sugar to a pint of the juice; boil ten minutes; bottle it and your lemonade is ready. Put a tablespoonful or two of this lemon sugar in a glass of water, and you have a cooling, healthful drink.

Hurtful to the Brain.

There is so much danger of hurting the brain by idleness as by overwork. Farquharson argues that intellectual power is lessened by the listlessness in which the well-to-do classes generally spend their lives. Under such conditions the brain gradually loses its health, and although equal to the demands of a routine existence, is unable to stand the strain of sudden emergency. If when a load of work is suddenly thrown on it its unprepared state, the worst consequences of that may be called overwork show themselves. Similarly a man accustomed to sedentary pursuits is liable to be physically injured by sudden or violent exercise. Dr. Farquharson further says that so long as a brain-worker can sleep well, eat well, and take a fair proportion of outdoor exercise, he is safe to go on. When any of these conditions fail, it is time to try a halt.

Airing Rooms.

It is a great mistake that the whole house, particularly sleeping rooms and dining rooms receive so little attention in ventilating and purifying the air, when it can be done with so little trouble and no expense. A pitcher of cold water placed on a table or bureau will absorb all the gases with which the room is filled from the respiration of the people sleeping in the apartment. Very few realize how important such purification is for the health of the family, or, indeed, understand that there can be any impurity in the rooms, yet in a few hours a pitcher or pail of cold water, the colder the more effective, will make the air of a room pure, but the water will be entirely unfit for use. In bedrooms a pail or pitcher of water should always be kept and changed often if any one stays in the room during the day, certainly be put in fresh when the immates retire. Both water should never be drank; but either a covered pitcher or glass bottle with a stopper should be used for drinking water, and always kept closely covered. Impure water causes even more sickness than impure air, and for that reason before using water from a pump or reservoir for drinking or cooking, enough should be drawn or pumped to clear the pipes before using it, particularly in the morning, after the water has been standing in the pipes all night.

Chicago Clerk (to employer) I shall have to ask for an increase of salary, Mr. Hunfat.

Employer—Why I raised your salary six weeks ago. What's the matter, your girl married.

Clerk—I know it, sir, but now I've got to go to the expense of a divorce.

Employer—Oh, well, say $2 a week more.

"I think you are unjust to me, father," said a young man, "non-recovery is worse as it were. I haven't the advantage which you say pod when you were young.

"What do you mean by that, sir?

"Your father was poor, you know."

Young Lady (decidedly decollete)—"Good evening, Mr. Gray. You don't know me, I guess.

Old gentleman—"Never what! This can't be Joe Harker's daughter Fanny!

"Yes it is. I have changed some since you saw me last."

"You have, indeed, Fanny. You have grown quite out of your gown, I declare."

Dr. Scalpel—I think I will have to call a consultation, sir, in your case."

Patient (alarmed)—"And why?"

Doctor (calmly)—"To ascertain whether you will be worth more to me dead than alive. You see I can easily claim my claim from the estate, but—"

Patient (who has the name of calling a strange physician every time he feels ill)—"That's just right, doctor; if you'll tell me about what it will be I'll pay you in advance."

"Grumy, what you going?"

"Grumy, he answers back, with noble voice, jouting lower lip and a savage aspect, turned round and confronted the wife—a mere. What I going! What I going! I ain't going to tell you what I game. You always asin, 'what I gamin' and why I gamin' I gamin what I gamin—dats what I gamin, what I gamin! what I gamin! what I gamin! what is gamin! what is gamin! I ain't gamin tell a what I game."

Philip, 7 years old, is proud of his standing at school. "Dad and his uncle, who had heard the boy speak rather delightfully about his school triumphs, "what is your relative rank in your class?

"I don't know what you mean, uncle.

"Why I mean where do you stand in your classes?

"Oh! in the reading class I stand just on the crack in front of the big desk, and in the rithmatic class I don't stand at all, cos we just sit on the recitation benches."

Miss Tattleton, entering suddenly—"It's raining, girls."

Dr. Spiceyrille, hastily rising—"You will excuse me. I want to be outside, don't you know, if it's raining girls."

Undertaker (to bereaved)—"In regard to the casket, madam—"

Bereaved—"I will leave that matter entirely to you, Mr. Mould. You know more about the styles than I do."

Boston Youth—"You said, Miss Vassar, that there was one question about Brown that you wanted to ask me."

Poughkeepsie Girl—"Er—oh yes do you know what kind of gum Browning chewed?"

Tramp—"Will the gentleman give a trifle to a poor man?"

Gentleman—"How do I know you are a poor man?"

Tramp—"How do I know you are a gentleman? It's only by the outside that anybody can judge."

In the barber's chair:

Young Gent—"Mighty straight hair I've got."

Old Barber—"Yes, sir.

Young Gent—"What will make it curl?"

Old Barber—"Got any money?"

Young Gent—"Yes."

Old Barber—"Got a sweetheart?"

Young Gent—"Yes."

Old Barber—"She got any?"

Young Gent—"No.

Old Barber—"Want to know what will make your hair curl?"

Young gent—"Yes."

Old Barber—"Get married!"

All Disposed Of.

They are telling a little story on the street about a well-known real estate man of considerable means who is a little careless in his business habits, and has drawn a number of unpaid bills to accumulate in various parts of the city. The other day he took it into his head to have a new will drawn up, and to that end he summoned a legal friend who was acquainted with his peculiarity. The lawyer put down the imposing clause "In the name of God, Amen," and then, "being of sound and disposing mind," &c. Then he looked at the man with a sigh.

"I desire" said the latter, "first, that all my just debts shall be paid."

The lawyer wrote, laid down his pen, and asked him to sign.

"But I haven't finished yet," said the sorrowful real estate man.

"Yes, you have," replied the lawyer. "That's all that's necessary. By the time that desire is complied with your estate will be taken care of."

Lady to dude (who has been trying to flirt)—"Sir, will you do me a favor?"

"With pleasure, madam; in what way can I serve you?"

"She—"I would like very much if you would ask the conductor to stop this way a minute."

"With pleasure."

He goes off and returns with the desired offering.

Lady to Conductor—"Will you please notify this man that if he always me any more you will stop the train and put him off?"

Conductor leads dude into the smoking car by his ear.

Rev. Mr. Poundtext Startled.

"And now," concluded the clergyman, after a long discourse, "We have seen that millions on millions of people have been benefited by following the scriptural injunction." Just then Lawyer Bond became so long enough to say in a sleepy manner, "More that the injunction to made permanent."

OUR CITY IN '49.

rodents swarmed all over the town, and their holdings of the premises were such, that the tiny creature trudging home to his 'loft' at night frequently stepped on the horrible, pulpy, slimy things and imagined, no doubt, that apoplexy of snakes were being strongly developed in his boots. Leaving this disagreeable phase of our sketch, we will direct our attention to another touching feature of early California life.

SUNDAY AT THE FIRST POST OFFICE.

The Post Office in 1849 was situated on the corner of Pike and Clay streets, and was a long, irregularly built, one story building. The Eastern mail used to arrive once a month—and Oh! how the rough bearded, excited miners used to watch for that eventful day. When it was announced that the mail had arrived and would be delivered on a certain day, that day saw the entire male population standing in one long line, stretching from the window of the Post Office and extending down as far as Portsmouth Square. What a study for an artist would the faces of those miners make! A celebrated painter once selected his pupils to commence painting a human subject only when the soul, from some unknown impulse shone in every feature of the face. And surely the souls of these exiles from home and kindred beamed in their faces, when cheered by the large of a "letter from home." The scenes on "Letter Day" were always very touching. On one occasion grinled, rough, but kindly looking miner brushed up to the window.

"Any letter for me?"

"What's your name," inquired the postmaster.

"My name! My name's Jack Smith. See if my Bessie's writ somethin' for me, please ye."

The postmaster brought a pack of letters to the window, and commenced turning them. The suffering, anxiety, excitement and expectation that blazed out from the poor miner's face during that moment was something which one seen, would never be forgotten. Finally the answer came:

"No letter for Jack Smith."

"What! no letter!" he gasped. "Postmaster, for God's sake look again, will ye? You may or passed it by by mistake." And to him the postmaster thumbed his letters again, and repeated:

"No letter for Jack Smith."

And then the poor fellow stood blankly for a moment at the postmaster, turned from the window with great big tears in his eyes and with bent head took his way to his lonely cabin.

Scenes like this were by no means rare. The other side of the picture was just as touching. When the fortunate miner did get a letter, his satisfaction was uproariously manifested. He would lovingly scrutinize the address on the envelope, and recognizing the writing to be that of his wife, his grown child, or his beloved mother, would passionately kiss the envelope, and retire to some quiet corner to sit down, if open and read—a dozen times over—the message from his loved ones.

SAN FRANCISCO'S FIRST COURT AND JUDGE.

Previous to December, 1849, Justice was unknown in California. The only court was held by Alcalds, who generally had no other book than the Spanish code, and Tuesday attorneys. In 1849 a Judge was sent to San Francisco, and a court established, which was a novelty to the people, and was conducted in a manner more nearly resembling the Court of Queen Bess than the Court of Queen Victoria. The court was held in a large tent, and the Judge was a jolly, good fellow, who was fond of his bottle, and was not averse to taking a game of cards, or a game of ten pins, or a game of anything else, for the matter of that, with any one who was his guest. Previous to 1850 California was governed by the Mexican code, and Judge Almond, by a home-made system of impartial equity, modified by the United States Statutes and Statutes with these laws.

The greater part of his business was done in settling claims against owners and masters of ships, and it was often jokingly remarked that Judge Almond always gave judgment against those who were best able to bear the costs. Moreover, His Honor completely broke up many young law sharks who attempted to make "spread-eagle" speeches. Things came to such a laughable and ridiculous pass finally, that the ship owners preferred to compromise claims with their employees and others, rather than run the direful risk of learning masters in the necessary hands of Judge Almond.

HOW THE FIRST CRIMES WAS MADE.

Queer results and happenings, laughable in their way, took place in nearly political year, in 1850 a census of the population was taken for the purpose of securing a basis of Congressional representation. San Francisco at that period had a political rivalry with the Pueblo county, San Francisco, however, furnished to returns, but the political necessity of the times caused it to be credited with population of 35,000. The most ludicrous means were used to back up the fraud," of the returns, and it was a notorious fact that the census men visited all the grog shops and accomplished a still more portion of the deed by transcribing their names, from the saloon registers! Truly, indeed, is it said that "necessity is the mother of invention."

It is interesting to note the composition of the population of San Francisco at this time (1850): The returns stated the total population to be 36,151; male whites, 30,150; female whites, 5,851; foreign residents, 16,537; females, 2,766.

THE FIRST CATHOLIC CHURCH.

Up on Pike street there was but one Catholic church in the young city, and in July of this year, Father Anthony Langlois, a pious French priest, erected the first St. Frances church. Becoming too small it was torn down, and a large barn-like structure was hauled to the site and made into a church. It was lined on the inside with cotton cloth which fluttered and shook ominously whenever strong gusts of wind whistled through the cracks but were the wall timbers. The church was reached by scrambling over uneven, rough hills, and large congregations of worshippers attended every Sunday. Of course they were thoroughly cosmopolitan in caste. There was the dreamy Spaniard with his hair sinewed and pigeon proud, the phlegmatic Indian, some Portuguese, Frenchmen, Americans and many Irish—faithful old race! where are they not! At the very time that the solemn services were being celebrated, only a stone's throw away around Washington square, the sounds of gambling salons would be thronged with desperate devotees to the goddess of luck. Their ears, high pitched and hoarse, contrasted strangely with the humble supplicants of the adoring priest, and Mr. Rush remembers how frequently the antitheses impressed itself upon him. The nightly scenes at these dens of vice and degradation were wild, fascinating and incongruous. Gambling games were brilliantly lit up with lamps and candles, and frequently at the back of the hall or in front of it, a band of music played excitedly with the fees of attracting the unpolished miner to the place, much after the way of the Cayenne siren who wiled her victims with a lute. It is hardly necessary to state that the proprietors of these saloons did not lose money.

GAMBLING WAS CARRIED ON

in open day as well as night. Let us enter for a brief moment into one of these places. There are several rickety tables, a gorgeous bar at which usually were congregated a lot of miners leaning against the counter in all imaginable attitudes, and talking on the all absorbing topic of gold, or cursing their ill luck as cards. The players usually were in study. At one table might be a rough, determined looking miner, whose appreciation of a joke was a gallon and a hearty slap on the back. Just opposite to the least mouth or cross-hollows was the dreadly resolver which he carried in full view in a rough belt around about his highly tattered shirt. Playing with him, as a dealer, might probably be a stage Frenchman, whose soft, alpine hands indicated that he made his living by his wits, to use a common expression. His garb might be as striking in its contrasts, as the other was disappointing. He might wear a soft, slouch hat, or if very well off, a sombrero hat which cost from $30 to $50, quite similar to the former, and probably a tinted shirt in which glittered a stupendous diamond pin. Tilted back in his chair with a cigar pinned at right angles in his mouth, his suave complacency was in strong contrast with his vis-vis—for such the rockless miner might be termed—who must probably would be bent over the table, his face strongly marked with anxiety, and his breathings, deep and heavy with suppressed excitement as the game narrowed to an end, or as the luck fluctuated—regarding the stakes—increased in number. Gambling at that time was indulged in by all classes and kinds of people, and was the principal amusement of the reckless and extravagant. Still the Catholic element of the population regularly. The two churches.

was very devotional, and attended Mass

ST. FRANCIS AND MISSION DOLORES.

and the more than crowded on the Feasts of Good Friday, Easter and Christmas. On these great Catholic festivals the ceremonies were more magnificent and impressive, and always attracted the entire population, irrespective of creed or nationality. We have only made mention of two churches, because they were all that were erected prior to 1851. In June of that year, Father Gallagher's parish was formed by St. John Maginnis who had left St. Andrew's Church, New York, to labor in this distant vineyard. Mr. Rosch remembers Father Maginnis to have been of a naturally irritable disposition, but he was zealous and truly devout. He erected a church, school and orphan asylum was built, and through the assistance of five Sisters of Charity in the management of the latter, the orphan asylum was built, and amongst the prominent laity who assisted in various ways were Michael Ryan, Jacob A. Rosch, John Parrot, Gustave Tonnelle, A. Bergin, Dr. Thomas Maguire, Shuster, H. J. Oliver, John O'Meara, Peter Chrystal and others. But a rare interview was mainly on pioneer reminiscences, anything happening after 49 or '50 seemed to be passed over. Enough has been stated to our article to show that even in the most unlovely place God's religion prospered, the only grow out of its nothingness, into a great commercial and industrial centre and, we are happy to add—a great Catholic centre as well.

Ex-Governor John O. Downey Married in Los Angeles.

LOS ANGELES, May 6.—Late Saturday night a marriage license was issued by County Clerk Dunsmores, very quietly and unknown to the public, for the marriage of ex-Governor John G. Downey and Miss Rosa V. Kelly. The license was issued to Governor Downey in person and he immediately drove to the Cathedral, where he was joined by the young lady, and the team were made one by Rev. Father Sonnell, assisted by Rev. Father Mora.

Miss Kelly is a brunette, possessing many accomplishments and many friends. For twenty years she has been an honored guest at Mr. Downey's household, and in so many ways both a friend and a sister to the lamented wife of the Governor, who, it will be remembered, was killed in the railroad disaster at Tehachapi some years ago. The Governor's friends are all pleased with his choice, and declare that he could not possibly have selected a helpmeet who would unite as many desirable qualities and be as such and so fair as the woman he has wed.

COENTOCK CLIPPINGS.

Correspondence of the Monitor.

—Every evening during May, Mass has been celebrated in St. Mary's Church, which are attended by large congregations.

—Michael Dunn was buried last week from St. Mary's Church. His mortal remains were accompanied to their last resting place by a large cortege of friends.

—St. Mary's beautiful Hospital, Sister Seraphina, Superioress, has been recently painted and white washed. It is a delightful place, neat and attractive throughout. Nothing may be found wanting, nothing may be found to be over-paid, painted and frescoed. It looks very both a gem. The large park which encircles this luxurious sanitarium is now one mass of variegated green. The trees are full and Sisters.

—Miss Maggie Cavanaugh, organist of St. Mary's Church, has been quite sick for two weeks past. Miss J. F. Egan is at present in San Francisco.

—Mrs. Gen. P. Keating and family are visiting Mrs. C. O. O'Sullivan of San Francisco.

—Some time ago, Mr. Thomas Dunn and his daughter, Miss Jane, Mamie Regan, M. Dunn, Maggie Lennan, Lizzie Ryan and Nettie Downey of Marysville, Cayucos, will return to their parents in Virginia City, where they will spend their vacation.

CATHOLIC LADIES' AID SOCIETY.

—The reunion at Shell Mound Park on May Day was a great success, both socially and financially, over two thousand persons were present. The games were well contested and attracted the crowd, being participated with valuable prizes, donated by friends of the C. L. A. S. through the exertions of Mrs. A. T. M. Donahue, the present president of the society, Mrs. Spies and Mrs. Kissella, was well patronized and received much praise. The ladies of the society have kept going all day long and added quite a respectable sum.

Members from Branches 1, 2, 3, 6, 8 and 10 were present, and were pleased to see the latter had made to be present, by the pleasure they had received. Such a union was the whole object that Mary-day hereafter will be considered the C. L. A. S. Day.

SECURE A HOME.

Wise is that man who can cast about beneath his own vine and fig tree upon California soil, and on land that he can call his own. It is not necessary to tell our readers that Alameda is the choicest spot in California. Its climate is unsurpassed, and a home in such a beautiful, healthy and prosperous city as Alameda county will not only afford great pleasure, but also secure profit to any purchaser. The Lowell Sale of 50 elegant residence lots is the very best location of Alameda—five years opportunity to procure homesteads in a moderate price. The property is described in our advertising columns, and as less than one tenth acre is required from purchaser it should go off like "hot cakes." For further information address the Lowell Land Company, Alameda, Cal., and cut out the Bay st. Station Ticket Office, 1 Ferry Building, San Francisco. Cal., will give interesting terms to the lots and give all necessary information concerning the splendid property which is certain to advance fully fifty per cent. in value inside of a few months.

MAY-DAY CELEBRATIONS.

The pupils attending Powell street Presentation Convent, gave a very enjoyable May Day entertainment on Tuesday afternoon, the 1st inst., at which an excellent programme was entertained. A similar celebration was also held at Lowell street Presentation Convent, Taylor street, large number of the pupils participating.

THE GROTTO OF OUR LADY OF LOURDES

In all the abiding scenes of bliss,
Save ever Holy Palestine,
Where, one fair day, doth thy glad home
Pour down their incense on such scenes
As blow that light to thy adorning
Our fair and favored Catholic France,
Where Mary's Sanctuaries stand—
Blest towers of strength to guard her land.
France, Eldest Daughter of the Church,
On whom descends the greatest which Flow from the Sacred Heart, so tell
The ardent pushing with emotion swell
In the Fountain of Mamelbielle.

Though thirty years are passed away,
Since on a calm, celestial day,
A silent pomp of the Pyrenees
A vision saw—It Faith still sees—
There frame the torrent of the Gave;
Nigh to Mamelbielle's lone cave,
A gentle child, one humble, poor,
A shepherd-boy, impalpable, pure,
Whom poverty did here receive
"The rather choice for mother's love,"
With patient, toiling footsteps never!
The Grotto, where to her appeared
The queen of Heaven in robes of white,
Surpassing brilliance of snow and light.

Young Bernadette while sleeping near
The Grotto, raised her head to hear
What sudden, rushing wind then swept,
To rouse the calm which there had slept,
While music of the torrent Gave
Alone, before had filled the Cave.
Bernadette! Could angels tell
The glory that around thee fell,
To meet that gentle maiden's glance!
Our Lady of Lourdes above stood
Angelic hosts. O favored France!
The Mother of God, Mary the Queen
Immaculate, majestic and serene,
The Virgin Mother confessed,
Smiles on she, o'er that kneeling child.

Queen of the Rosary! she bore
A chaplet of that pearl of prayers,
Which softly through her hand she moves,
And sweetly smiles as the prayer she loves—
The Salutation of Gabriel—
Ascends from earth to Mamelbielle,
To greet the Mother of the Word.
Her Mystical Rose, whose fragrance poured
A priceless balm o'er Earth from Lourdes;
That balm of cross and mercy flows,
To heal the wounds of woe
Which Science falleth to assuage
In the contrite of her Golden Age.

Health of the Sick! Cause of Our Joy!
Flow, Heart of Wisdom, sweet apply
The remedy that cures each pain,
The Balm-of-healing with which stain
In soul and body, heart and brain.

Hail Morning Star! o'er Eden's shine,
Immaculate Conception! Hail!
To crush the demon-serpent's head;
Through thee the Sun of Justice shed
The light of grace—and darkness fled.
So Virgin Mother, in thy Shrine
Your streams of grace and light divine
From which infinity o'er flow
Such where first it took its rise,
The abyss whence dwells the Father of Lies.

Hail! "Immaculate Conception!"
Mystic Rosary of the Incarnation,
Of Redemption this mysterious divine
Shall form a halo 'round thy Shrine.
Our Lady of Lourdes! above shall stand
Ever—ever—this splendore on thy Feast.

ST. JOSEPH.

Afar in the realms above,
Basking in smiles of love
That helpful beam on the Eternal face;
With dazzling whiteness robed,
There in blest abode,
Are mighty saints—God's favored race.

Like heaven's own vault at night,
Glowing with stars serenely bright,
The abode in Paradise appears;
Unnumbered for thee and,
That side the yielding bed,
Which comes wave in anger fear.

Around God's presence bright,
Like countless gems of light,
Thou art the moon in glory tried;
Thus circle saints above,
Around the Sun of love,
Reflecting their splendor from the face of God

But 'mid the heavenly throng,
Thy place is more than all
The prince of the mighty One;
St. Joseph, ever blest,
With super-abundant dower,
With heaven's own wondrous brightness

In distant ages gone,
When God's co-equal Son
Appeared in human bonds of skin;
St. Joseph, stainless heart,
Alone was set apart
From earth and Man to father Him.

Beneath his kindly face,
The Saviour of our race,
From human youth to manhood grew;
His magic influence rare,
Was plushed from Heaven fair,
And blessed distilled in Mary's dew.

In St. Joseph's tender arms,
Secure from fears and harms,
The infant Jesus often laid;
Such favors as we ask,
Dashed Joseph's heart in bliss,
And bitter troubles oft allayed.

Oh, Saint Joseph, ever mild,
Foster-father of the Child,
Light our path with Virtue's sun—
That is a fairer land,
In heaven's angelic band,
We'll star the dome of the Mighty One.
J. T. CUTTRIGHT.

IF THOU WERT NOT MY LOVE, O! GOD.

If Thou wert not my Love, O! God,
How dark and sad my heart would be;
If Thou wert not my Hope, O! God,
How could I have such a misery.

A weary pilgrim I have been Since morning dawned upon my way,
A weary pilgrim I must be
Till night has covered flags display.

A few kind friends to-day I met,
I had to part before their door;
They greeted me—they went for—
But now they dream of me no more.

I fain would sit upon the Cross,
And sin that cost so long denied;
But oh, oh, oh, I must move on Till I have crossed Life's Desert wide.

The seeds are left, the seeds are red
With blood that dyed my heart and brain;
How can I stand the chasm's breach!
My God, forgive, if I complain.

If Thou wert not my Light, O! God,
How dark my pathway would be—
If Thou wert not my strength, O! God,
How could I bear Life's misery!

Literary Miscellany.

Miss Finch's Editorial Experiment.

A Sorio-Comic Truthful Tale.

Eleven o'clock of a summer forenoon in the sanctum of the Sandwich Morning Bugle. The chief was seated at his table, tugging at his moustache, and ever and anon languidly marking a paragraph in the newspaper which lay open before him.

He was planning from the issue of that morning for the weekly edition—the Clarion, with "the largest circulation in the States."

It was his habit to visit the office in the forenoon for this purpose; also to take note of the delinquencies of the foreman and the night editor; to look over the morning mail, and to lay out the programme of the day.

It was evident, however, that on this occasion something was on the editor's mind and from the quality and availability of the paragraphs he was marking. And, in fact, the very day before, his most useful assistant had left him to "accept a position, as the personal item column announced, on the Boston Highflyer. This change had been anticipated and was not regretted, for it was the pride of the chief to train up promising young journalists to an excellence which brought them into demand, and then wish them God speed to more conspicuous and lucrative posts. Yet the vacancy was to be filled, and perhaps this consideration accounted for the vigorous pulls at the chief's moustache, the occasional groans in the dalle of blue pencil, and the nervous slaps at ragged water-bugs.

A firm, but gentle, tapping at the sanctum door.

"Come in," cried the chief, without looking up.

A young lady briskly entered the room. Petite she was, with small regular features, inquisitively grey eyes, and checks hanging out rosy signals of agitation. A close fitting black velvet bonnet set off a trim and shapely figure; a plain black skirt and neglige straw hat completing the costume. She might have been 20, she might have been a slender figure gave her a more youthful appearance.

"Good morning, Mr. Russell," she said, advancing with a resolute air to the editor's table.

"Ah, good morning," echoed the chief, raising his eyes inquiringly.

"I have come to see if you will give me a position on your paper?"

The chief dropped his pencil. Here was an event glimpsed headlong into the current of his meditations.

"Will you be seated, Miss —" he remarked.

"Julia Finch," she interjected. "I am a daughter of Thomas Finch of Ayresdown. You know of him, I think."

"Yes, I curse my bin, but—and so you want to try your hand on a newspaper. Had any experience?"

"No, sir. What would be required of me?"

"Writing any!"

"A little, just by way of practice."

"Published anything?"

"No, sir.

"Well, I hardly know. The force is short just now, and it is an easy time of year. I have thought I would like to try a woman on the staff."

All this time the chief was sharply scanning the candidate beneath his spectacles. There was an air of determination and energy about her that pleased him. He was not a man to tolerate dreamers on the editorial force of the Bugle.

"I believe I will venture the experiment for a month," he added, after his inspection of the candidate was ended.

A gleam of satisfaction flashed in the inquisitive grey eyes.

"When shall I begin to do? Or some changes, and make up the news and miscellany. You might give special attention to such matters as interest women.

"What are you going to pay me?

"Seven dollars a week will be about right, I think."

"What would you give a man in the same position?"

"Ten dollars, probably.

"Why do you make that difference?

"You cannot be expected to do night work, and there are some places where I am used a male reporter but not a woman. I think seven dollars a week is all you can earn at present.

"Oh!"

The engagement was settled and the chief, after finishing the editing of his weekly, departed in search of a boarding place for his new assistant. Two days afterward Miss Julian Finch was installed in the Bugle sanctum.

There was only a single room for the editorial force, nailed off at one end, and provided with four desks and tables. The new comer sat on one side of the room, with her back to the others. The chief's position was such that he could observe her.

When Miss Finch entered the office to begin her duties, the "Local" was perched at his desk, having strolled in during the leisure of the forenoon to refresh his mind by practice on his banjo.

At sight of this apparition he hastily removed his hat, and laid his pipe and instrument upon the table. A vibrating leg was also lifted from the arm of the chair, and he rose to his feet.

"Step pardon, Miss. What can I do for you?"

"I am to occupy this desk," Miss Julia responded with a blush. Mr. Russell has engaged me. Are you one of the force?"

The astonishment depicted upon the Local's countenance it would be difficult to describe.

"Ah! indeed," he murmured—he was a gallant young fellow—"very happy, I'm sure. I'm the city editor; here's my card. I hope you'll be comfortable here; sorry there isn't a separate room for you; you mind smoking?"

Julia replied that she supposed she could put up with it if it was essential to the evolution of a daily journal. Whereupon the Local excused himself with some perturbation, and fled with pipe and banjo to the composing room. There he held an animated conference with the foreman. In adds which, for purposes of "copy," gave access to the sanctum was seen cautiously opened, while several pairs of eyes in succession eagerly took notes of the new member of the sanctum.

It was a general conviction in the composing room that the chief must be "cracked," and the Local gave vent to his agony by assenting "Poor Old Joe" with great vehemence on his banjo.

During the next few days the sanctum was the scene of various amusements, which tire by one, on different occasions, the familiars of the office came roaring in without the formality of knocking, bursting full of some piece of news, which they could hardly wait before getting fairly made. The consternation with which these visitors pulled up, and lapsed into silence on the sound many a rebellious twitch at the editorial moustache, and even gave rise to a suspicious shaking of the twin shoulders at the sole table.

After a few of these incidents, a solemn hush fell upon the sanctum in the working hours of the afternoon. The night editor, who now came in to do an hour's paragraph work, which proved to be rather out of date, finally transferred his quarters to the composing room.

Hoarse and smothered echoes of the same indicated that the Local's moments of leisure were enjoyed in the seclusion of the composing room. That worthy did not take his table, yet, as his duties now mostly out of doors, his intervals of afternoon work in the office were few and. He was endeavoring to be the new assistant. Indeed, being a devotee of "the way," he made some advances toward a mild flirtation. But as time wore firmly discountenanced—Julia usual being strictly upon business intent—he was soon driven into the region of polite commonplaces.

There was to be a woman's convention at Hazlehead about this time, and it naturally occurred to the chief how appropriate it would be for the Bugle to represent itself by a woman. He suggested this idea to Julia, who received it with fangirl. On the day of the convention she departed in high spirits, duly furnished with note-book, pulls and passes and certificate, as a regular member of the honorable body of reporters.

It was half past nine in the evening when she burst into the office, radiant with enthusiasm.

"Oh! I have had such a splendid time," she ejaculated, to the great admiration of the group of frequenters collected in the sanctum—for these women had discovered that the lady editor favored the evenings with her absence.

"I wouldn't have missed it for the world. There was a lady reporter from the Tribune, and I got introduced to Miss Anthony, and Mrs. Stanton, and Kate Field, and a lot of others. I never had such a treat in my life."

"Well, the report, is it ready?" asked the chief, blandly extending his hand for the manuscript.

"Why, no! I haven't written a word; I was too busy and excited."

"Haven't you the notes of the meeting?"

"Oh! dear no. I couldn't do it. I was completely carried away."

"Pish," shouted the chief, through the slide to the night editor, "you'll have to chip a report of that convention from the Hazlehead evening papers."

"Impossible—Nothing more to regret, to-night, Miss Julia. Be added.

"Oh, I'm sorry—I thank you, but I really couldn't, you know. I did have a good time, though. I'll pay much about it tomorrow.

"Very well. Good night."

The Local's visitors disappeared, the sitters resumed their pipes; and the snap of the editorial sheets alone broke the silence, although smiles of exceeding broadness illuminated every face in the sanctum.

Miss Julian was of no small, that was evident to the chief. He was furtively observing her the next afternoon, when he noticed that she seemed to have drifted into a state of perfect idleness, her hand pencil loosely in her fingers, tapping it on the table, sliding her digits down and repeating the process at the other end. The nonchalance briskly dipped in the bottle, but transferred upward in the air. The young woman's head bent over in a unsong attitude. A sudden titter escaped her lips. This recalled her to herself for an instant, and she soon relapsed into reverie. Another chased each other over her half averted face now and then a hysteric giggle was smothered and once she wiped away a tear.

Evidently, thought the chief, that young woman has something on her mind which does not concern the readers of the Bugle. Soon her work began to show signs of haste and inattention. One afternoon the chief was surprised to see her fling her pen aside, and fall to with great assumption upon her desk as if blank paper.

"Oh! she is trying an editorial, may be that is hopeful, he murmured to himself. Julia had, at his request, essayed sundry editorial paragraphs, but, as a rule they had lapsed into sentiment and emotional descriptions. Perhaps now she had an inspiration for a leader. Perhaps—

The manuscript grew rapidly beneath her pen. At length it was complete. She half turned around and a smile of content lighted up her face. The chief, who had already preparing to stretch out his hand for the expected editorial when Julia sidled therein and sealed it in taste. "Excuse me a few moments," she said, rising. "I have an important letter to mail, and she vanished from the sanctum. The chief gave a deprecatory shake of his moustache.

The month of trial was now drawing to a close. Increased demands upon the Bugle's columns were exacting harder work from the staff. It was evident that Julia could not perform the duties expected of an assistant in her position; an additional member of the force was hardly needed, and would not be afforded. The chief pulled his moustache reflectively. He liked Julia; he was pleasant to see her trim figure and attractive face in the sanctum. He shrank from the conclusion that his experiment was a failure. Yet, after all, Julia must go. He could give her notice in the morning. It was too bad; all the office prophets would have the laugh on him, but yet—

"Miss Julia," he said the next forenoon, "your work is nearly up, and I must give you notice that we need a man in your place. We really cannot do all that is required.

"Excuse me, Mr. Russell," the young lady interrupted, "I am glad you have spoken, but you have only anticipated me. I know that I cannot do what you require, and am only putting extra work on the others. I had made up my mind to leave the office. I think I have learned all I can. I am quite satisfied, only sorry if I have made you any trouble."

So it was amicably settled, and the chief emitted a sigh of relief as he sat down to write a letter to one of the correspondents of the Bugle whose work seemed promising. The Local made the sanctum fairly ratile with jigs on his long-suffering banjo the day after Julia's departure. The night editor contentedly resumed his seat in the inner office. The siftings were whispered about, and specially the familiars began to hurl in afternoons with their hurricanes of gossip.

Three months later the chief opened a journal from a neighboring State, and lo! there was a red line drawn around the marriage notices. "In Blanktown, November Blank, by Rev. Blank Blank, Mr. George Hillash and Miss Julia Finch of Ayrestown," was what he read.

"So that accounts for the supposed editorial, and the impertinent letter," Hum, haw! and the sitters, and the blushes, the tears and the reverie. So thought the chief, as he commenced the new to his assistants.

He was mistaken. Six months more rolled away. A group of heads were bent together over the editorial table. The latest radical and collective eyes of the Bugle staff were fixed upon an open volume just received by post with the "compliments of the author."

"Three Progressive Girls, by Julia Finch," was the title. It was a sprightly novel from the pen of an enthusiastic pen. One of the heroines was a teacher, one a musician, and one a writer attached to the staff of a daily paper.

They were all there—the chief, the local, the night editor, the foreman, the apprentices familiars, and even the pasteyed and lame.

"Hip, hip!" exclaimed the Local, "Julia's the play in the Bugle!" He was making a study of us. She's got you dead-to-rights, forewarned, that's us."

The chief immediately fell back on his moustache. His fingers twisted and pulled in exact time with the tumultuous stamping of the Local's banjo. His experiment had been a good one. To be sure, it had not developed a reporter, but then it spread a successful romance.

Four months resolutions and authors sold so far not traffic much to good for to almost at the rate of ten cents a line. About eighteen's active fee.

READING FOR MAY.

A Legend of Our Lady.

It was a cloudy, and the burning rays of the eastern sun came down fiercely upon the yellow sand of the desert over which St. Joseph with the Virgin Mother and her Child traveled on their way to the land of Egypt. Not a tree or bush was there to shelter them, and much did the travelers suffer from thirst and heat, yet they murmured not, but passed the time in whispered prayer.

Suddenly the ass stopped, and would not go forward. What had he seen? Joseph went about and way in the desert, and to his astonishment, he saw a fine spring. Joseph looked anxiously at the Blessed Virgin and at Divine Son.

But as they stood dismayed Jesus stretched out His Hand and smiled, and the travelers saw before them, but a few paces distant, a little stunted, withered bush which they had not noticed before, and Mary alighted and spread her cloak there, so that the Holy Child might rest.

But in that moment, instead of a poor withered bush, there was a blossoming tree of hawthorn, full and shapely, covered with white fragrant flowers, and beneath its shade sparkling in green grass, amidst which floated a spring of water.

Reverently and devoutly did St. Joseph and our Lady thank God for His gifts, while they refreshed themselves with the life giving cooling fruits to relieve their thirst.

Then the Infant Saviour said, "My dear, as this poor shrub did blossom for thee this day, so shall those who call them with virtue and Mary who shall be to the Holy Ones and in remembrance of this province is a shrub of the hawthorn shall blossom every the month which Christians yet offer—and shall be called the Mary's Hawthorn, and shall seede throughout the earth that may know the Lord, and shall be called Mary's Hawthorn, adorn thine image."

Then the Blessed Virgin took up her cloak in which the little Jesus had rested, and as they continued their way, the angels divided the sand into a fine dust, which they blessed, carrying them to different parts of the earth, as the Blessed Virgin had said, they sang the praises of God and the purity and devotion of His Blessed Mother.

O'CONNELL MEMORIA CHURCH

Father O'Riordan Enthusiastically Welcomed in Chicago.

On the arrival in Chicago of the Rev. Father O'Riordan, who, with Father Kelly, was collected in St. Augustin's behalf of the O'Connell Church, a hearty welcome was accorded. The very Rev. Canon Hennessy, who had been in Chicago a few days, and a dozen miles off, accompanied Father O'Riordan to his home. After the evening, two items in the church, the streets became alive with people, and the Rev. Canon and Father O'Riordan, issued from the Presbytery, and proceeded by that a train was headed by blushing tar barrels, passed through the town, roadways and sidewalks were thronged with an enthusiastic crowd, who gave vent to their feelings such repeat as something on the hand which they does not concern the readers of the Bugle. Suffice, her work began to show signs of haste and inattention. One afternoon the chief was surprised to see her fling her pen aside, and fall to with great assumption upon a blank sheet of blank paper.

KNOWNOTHINGISM.

The "Patriotic Order Sons of America" Properly Denounced.

Mary Quinny McNeill, the old radical warhorse and latter of slaves and caste, recently received the following letter, with a request that she should forward it for Freedom leading, the man-hunt of which read Patriots—who Sons of America.

HOME OF THE SONS PATRIOTIC PARTY, Lake Michigan, Chicago—Dear Sir—I understanding that you are a native born American, I inclose you a circular with the request that you read the circular carefully and let me know if you will join should a camp be started in your vicinity. Also please send me the name and address of a few Catholic gentlemen, that I may send them circulars. Our order is growing rapidly in this State, but we will not be satisfied until a camp is established in every county, and we expect the support of every true American. Trusting soon to hear from you I am, yours in the cause.

J. MCGRATH BRIEN,
Dec. Prest at Large, Illinois.

That Patriotic President Brien should not be disappointed in the last hope expressed, however it may be as to the rest, the mind forbids, and so she in the pleasure and glorious of the following, which she composed and sent to the Boston review similar in vitaness.

Lo, a new Hi, O Mary! Sons of South Paul street, Chicago, Ill., have received yours of yesterday, and in answer thereto all say that the platform and principles of the Patriotic Sons of America are in full accord with Knownothing, into college and Knownothing, and we will do all in our power to make application to membership in our order. We will do all in our power to make organization against any person who happened to be a Catholic, or who may be in favor of the rights of the Old Knownothing lodge I was requested to pledge myself "not to vote for any person who is not a member of the order." Of course I did so, and I assure you I implied that any person, born in America, who was not a member of the order, the betterment of the library which we expect to open in the near future, and which we should have my request that I hold intolerance, but that the organization allowed "not to vote for any person who is not a member." Of course, I pledged myself to vote for any person, born in America, who was a member of our order, and will not encourage any person who is not a member. I am a member of the Knownothing lodge, and I know that there are many in America who are better than Catholics, and I know that right and wrong, and I know that there are many Catholics who are better than Knownothings, and I know that there are many Knownothings who are better than Catholics

The Papal Rescript Not Promulgated.

At last we have definite news from Ireland concerning the fate of the Papal Rescript which has caused so much commotion throughout the world during the past few weeks. Here is the cablegram as it appeared in the daily press:

NEW YORK, MAY 11.—A London cable special to the Mail and Express says: At the conclusion of the annual meeting of the Dublin Roman Catholic Episcopal last week, an informal exchange of views occurred with regard to the scope of the Pope's Rescript on politics in Ireland. The opinion was arrived at that, apart from the question of the Pope's authority in the matter, aside from substantial grounds, and also, from the ultimate effect of the Rescript on Ireland's church and people, the promulgation at present would be inexpedient and would be misunderstood by the Protestants. Two views have been formulated as to the Vatican's attitude in the present the matter remains in abeyance.

The Irish Prelates do not enter into the question of the ethics of hypnotizing and the plea of campaign which was raised in the circular. They desire to obtain a thorough recognition of the whole subject. There is a very strong feeling in Irish Roman Catholic circles against Mgr. Persico being again sent to Ireland. A move has been initiated to defend certain prominent Irish based and lost by Tory sympathizers ready to avert all their influence against the tyranny of the Holmer administration.

If the above report is to be relied on, there has been no promulgation of the Papal Rescript in Ireland, hence there has been no publication of the Papal Rescript condemning Boycotting, the Plan of Campaign, or any other measure of reprisal by any portion of the people of Ireland in their present contest against this tyranny, injustice and inhuman conduct of the English government in that unhappy country.

In this view of the case the National League stands precisely where it stood a month ago, and the patriotic Irish Prelates who have stood up so bravely for their people in the face of British influence in Rome, are worthy of the united thanks of every friend of Erin throughout the whole civilized world.

It is very unfortunate both for the Catholic Church and for the National cause in Ireland, that these periodical spasms of excitement should occur. It is also to be regretted that all documents from Rome have to go forth into the world dressed up in the language of the bitterest and most vicious enemies of both Rome and Ireland—the editors of England's ministry.

Had this Rescript been first perused by the Irish Bishops—to whose shores it was addressed, the people of Ireland and their firm and fast friends all over the globe, would have heard the contents of the document in Irish or Latin, and no excitement would have ensued. But the irritation which the Irish people and their millions of Catholic sympathizers all over the world are subjected to periodically, by means of false and sneering translations of Papal documents, is calculated to arouse passion and to annihilate that docile spirit of respect for Church authority which has always been characteristic of the Irish people.

Ireland's loyalty to Rome is proverbial, and England has long sought to make a breach therein by just such means as the late Rescript presented. Any antagonism which would arise between the Pope and the Irish people would make hell rejoice and heaven weep. Therefore, Catholics should be very careful not to give any comfort to the enemies of both the Church and the Irish people, by indulging in any the themes against the Holy Father when their intellect is inflamed by the falsehoods of their ancient enemy. The Bishops of Ireland, the priests of Ireland, and the Irish people at home are far more immediately interested in this Rescript than are we in America. The Irish Bishops, as a rule, are able to take care of the National cause, and to defend it when called upon, even against a whole College of Cardinals. Hence it is the acme of absurdity, as well as actually damaging to the Irish cause, when Catholic Irishmen undertake to "condemn" the "Vicar of Christ because he simply admonishes the Irish people not to transgress the laws of God as administered by the church of Christ.

Ireland's mission in her present struggle can never be achieved by means of assaults against the Holy Father. His is the banner under which the Irish people and priests of Ireland alone can conquer, and those ultra-patriots in this land who think they are doing Ireland a service by denouncing Pope Leo XIII., are greatly mistaken. The Sovereign Pontiff has, wherever occasion offered, spoken well and favorably of Ireland's right to struggle for her freedom, but the principles upon which that struggle is based must be consonant with the occasions of the Catholic Bishops of Ireland. They are the caretakers of the Catholic faith of the people of that country, and they never can countenance that style of political patriotism which thinks to aid Ireland in attaining her freedom by indulging in any denunciations of the Pope, as all such resolutions rather retard than advance the Home Rule prospects of the Irish people.

—Among the many misrepresentations of "news" which the cable carried to the daily press last week, was a certain cablegram in which it was falsely asserted that "Archbishop Walsh has been having frequent conversations recently with Cardinal Simeoni. The latter urged the necessity of submitting to the Pope's rescript. The Archbishop declared his readiness to submit to the Pope's order, but said that he could not act in opposition to his own conscience. He would rather do so without making any difficulty and resign his position. It is reported that if he should resign he would be created a Cardinal." Now it is scarcely necessary to say that the foregoing assertions have been fabricated from whole cloth. Such a thing as a Bishop who would resign his see under the circumstances portrayed in the London much Roman cablegram, being elevated to the dignity of a Cardinal, is utterly impossible of occurrence in the Catholic Church. The whole cablegram is concocted as a "clincher" to last week's "news" about the Irish National League, and there is not so much truth in it as there is in Leicester's little finger.

The Saint Called "Crazy" by Ignorant Critics of God's Church.

When infidelity is allied with ignorance and impertinence, there are no bounds to its indecency. Dr. Macfarlane and the other medium of Agnew's Station in Santa Clara county, who set themselves up as censors of the Catholic Church, on a recent occasion, proved their ignorance, exposed their bigotry, and evinced their infidelity, when they embodied these unfriendly sentiments in a report which they made to the State Medical Society:

"During the late Agnew meeting, inquiries were canvassed. The material for manifesting saints was absent for several centuries. St. Simon, for example, fried for thirty years on the top of a tower only there lost in distance, and short for a whole year on one leg, the other being crowed with stones. Had he lived during our time, he would have been sent to an asylum for the chronic insane."

Such are the views of Dr. Macfarlane and his medical companions concerning a Saint of God's Church regarding whom it is very clear, from their manifest ignorance—they know about as much as the Esquimaux do concerning the electric motor.

St. SIMON STYLITES, the great servant of God whom those veritable Know-nothings call "crazy," was one of the few men whom Almighty God inspired with more than ordinary powers of endurance and with supernatural devotion, so that he might use the weak instrument in the hands of God by whom thousands of persons might be converted to Christianity.

This Saint was originally a shepherd in the employment of his father, but a heavy fall of snow occurring, he placed his flock in a safe place, then went away from his church and there heard the gospel read that contains, among others, these Beatitudes spoken by our Divine Redeemer in His memorable Sermon on the Mount:

"Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.

"Blessed are the meek, for they shall possess the land.

"Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted.

"Blessed are they who hunger and thirst after justice, for they shall have their fill.

"Blessed are they that suffer persecution for justice sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.

"Blessed are the clean of heart, for they shall see God."

Pondering upon these words of our Divine Saviour, St. Simeon Stylites became so "crazy" that he concluded to try and serve his soul by "leaving all things," by "taking up his Cross," and by imitating the Son of God in His privations and sufferings. For doing this Dr. Macfarlane and his confederate critics say "Had he lived during our time he would have been sent to an asylum for the chronic insane."

A few days after St. Simeon heard the sermon which caused him to give up the world and to devote himself entirely to God's service, he consulted a venerable priest, who told him that continual prayer, watching, fasting, weeping, humiliation and patient suffering of penancetimes were pointed out by our Divine Lord in the Beatitudes as the road to true happiness and that a solitary life afforded the best opportunity for enforcing the practice of these good works, and confirming a man in solid piety. Such advice would doubtless cause "Macfarlane, the "crazy" St. Simeon Stylites and asked Almighty God to direct him in the best way he could serve Him whom Cross he had voluntarily offered to carry through life. He then entered a monastery, became one of a number of those "crazy" monks whom Dr. Macfarlane would like to incarcerate, and after a few years spent in their society, he acquired that spiritual knowledge which is absolutely necessary in order to mould men so that they may become sufficiently sanctified to serve God. Dr. Macfarlane and his medics might consider such a "foolish" line of time on the part of St. Simeon, strong proof of his insanity, but they must remember that there were wise men in the world long before Protestantism denounced the "foolishness" of the Cross as a sign of Redemption.

St. Simeon stayed with these monks a few years, when he moved to a hermitage at the foot of a mountain, where he passed the forty days of Lent without partaking of any food. (More "foolishness" says Dr. Macfarlane.) Three years later the Saint moved his domicile to the top of the mountain, where he built a small rude stone pen in which he lived. But such crowds of people flocked to this "crazy" man for benediction, counsel and advice, that it left him little time to pray; so he resolved, in the year 423, to erect a pillar twelve feet high upon which he lived for happier and more in communion with God than do those medics of Agnew's Station who slandered him.

St. Simeon preached twice a day from the summit of his pillar to vast crowds of Arabs and men of other Eastern nations who came to learn wisdom from this "crazy" servant of God. The result of his preaching was miraculous, because he effected what other missionaries, who were not so "foolish," failed to accomplish. The hearts of the wild tribes of the desert could not be softened until Almighty God raised up the "crazy" St. Simeon Stylites as His Apostle to bring the Word of God to bear good fruit in their souls. Through the Saint's preaching vast numbers of Persians, Armenians and Iberians, with the entire nation of the Lazi in Colchis, were converted. Indian queens, princes and people traveled long journeys in order to get his blessing. The Emperor Theodosius the younger, and Leo, often consulted him and begged his blessing. And yet, this is the eminent man whom Dr. Macfarlane and other medics of Agnew's Station say he would have lived in our time he would have been sent to an asylum for incurable idiots."

This great Saint of God died in the year 459, being found dead in a kneeling position on his pillar. Thus he died the death of a Saint while adoring God! Such was the "crazy" man who was borne in state to Antioch, attended by many Bishops and by vast throngs of sensible people who loved and venerated the memory of this wonderful Saint whose festival is still kept all over the East, in consequence of the vast number of miracles that have been performed through his intercession.

It will no doubt make Dr. Macfarlane and his unfortunate co-partners in this conspiracy to calumniate the character of St. Simeon Stylites, feel rather abashed when they learn that even so enlightened an English Protestant divine as Rev. S. Baring Gould, M. A., was "foolish" enough to write a biography of this "crazy" Saint. In that work he eulogizes the holy man whom Dr. Macfarlane scoffed at in a straight jacket. Alluding to the thousands who were converted by St. Simeon, Dr. Baring Gould says: "Had a says are not as crazy as these. The Dial who needed their souls, called upon the soul of Simeon to do the work, and Simeon obeyed, and transved perhaps than any soul paid man has yet trod. It is not for us to condemn a mode of life which there is no need for us to follow now. It was needed then, and he is rightly numbered with the Saints, who admitted his will to that of God, to make of him an instrument for His purpose."

Such is the eulogy which a Protestant pays to St. Simeon Stylites, and we leave Dr. Macfarlane and his mummer brethren to "blush unseen" in the shrubbery at Agnew's Station. It would also be well for those medical gentlemen if they would ponder frequently in prayer to St. Simeon Stylites and ask him to endow themselves with even a very little of the grace of God and the good sense which the Saint demonstrated during life. Sinners may call Saints "fools," but intelligent people all well understand the reason why Almighty God often chooses the "foolish" things of this world to confound the worldly wise, and the weak things of this world to overthrow the strong; the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God, as it is written: "He taketh the wise in their own craftiness." And thus has been caught the sensorious calumniators of St. Simeon Stylites, who have been trapped in the snare of Dr. Macfarlane, being perverted with the power, fell prey of Catholic truth.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

—Sir Charles Russell, speaking to the Hounslow Liberals, on Tuesday night, said that the knowledge of English sympathy for Ireland alone kept Irishmen from adopting extreme measures.

—The Pope has received through Cardinal Simeoni a magnificent silver ewer from the Cognier family, of Lyons, France. This is the same ewer that was used by Pope Pius VII. at the ceremonies attending the coronation of Napoleon I. at Paris.

—The Catholic missionaries, Fathers Verron and Couppe, have found that the river which they discovered in New Guinea, and named after the St. Joseph, is navigable for inland, and winding through a fruitful and thickly-peopled region.

—Count Moltke-Hvitfeldt, Minister Plenipotentiary of Denmark, in Paris, has been received into the Catholic Church. The conversion of the head of the Chapter of the Lutheran Cathedral at Copenhagen, is also announced.

—We see that the Kreuz Zeitung, the Papal Organ at Berlin, the friend of the Red Eagle, with brilliants, is regarded as a sign that the relations between Rome and the Holy See are becoming more thoroughly satisfactory.

—The popularity of the forthcoming Irish Exhibition in London promises to attain the height of an important industrial movement. The Lord Mayor and Corporation of London have lent the Council now include those of the Earl of Aberdeen, the Lord Mayor of Dublin, the Earl of Dufferin, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and Sir Algernon Borthwick, Bart., M. P.

—It is announced by cable that the Rev. Father "Lemonas" has been appointed Bishop of Vancouver Island, to succeed Archbishop Seghers. We presume this means Rev. J. N. Lemmens, who is attached to that Diocese, and whose learning, prudence and fitness for the station of a bishop, eminently qualify him for the position to which he has been exalted by the Holy Father. We congratulate Father Lemmens and wish him many years of unalloyed happiness in the See which furnished the first martyr for the Faith on this Coast.

—Our respected contemporary, the Catholic Globe-times, finds a very good illustration of an old and strong argument in favor of the celibacy of the clergy in the case of the Rev. Dr. Parkhurst, Protestant minister of New York City, who lately sent word to his flock that owing to scarlet fever in his family, he must close his house to callers, and be excused from his ministerial duties till the danger was over. (!!) The Globe-times quotes, by contrast, the case of Father Bigelow, of Steubenville, Ohio, who some years ago had his life by assenting a sick call from a man suffering from small-pox, whose common was refused by every Protestant minister whom he had first sent for." The Globe-times adds: "Father Bigelow's Catholic priest," while our contemporary, "having no entangling alliance, and being under the sacred obligations of his profession, never hesitated, but bravely and heroically gave on his sick calls without question and without fear."

—Readers of the Monitor will remember that Queen Victoria was said to have sent a relic of some saint to Leo XIII. by the Holy Father when celebrating his Jubilee Mass. Mr. P. L. Connellan, the Rome correspondent of the Boston Pilot now says that the Queen's gift was a piece of the Holy Cross which Victoria in a letter to Leo said that it was her wish that it be worn at Rome; that he wear the relic on his breast, and that he wear the relic on his breast.

The Pontiff's gracious acts not merely expanding as the Presbyterian Thompson thinks. Father Gibson in his knowledge of the Scriptures, knows that Christ gave to the Pope of Rome, the successor of the Apostles, power to bind and loose, the Scriptures were given with the Holy Ghost of language by men inspired by God, and, according to a learned historian called Eusebius—of whom perhaps neither the Oakland Thompson nor the San Francisco Thompson has heard—St. Peter wrote his First Epistle from Rome. Even at that early day the Church had become so well established and so spread that "the faith was spoken of throughout the whole world," as recorded in the first Epistle of St. Peter. Rome was Christ's chosen foundation in Rome it was called "Roman" then and ever since, and being universal, it was called "Catholic," and when St. Peter was the first Pontiff of the Roman Catholic Church.

We are somewhat surprised that the Student should be so ignorant on the subjects which it desires enlightenment. As a general thing Presbyterian preachers seem to imagine themselves to be the enlightened and only possessors of all things human and divine, in heaven and on earth. And yet, notwithstanding this epistatical assumption on the part of these pretentious preachers, if what they do not know about God's truth were written in a book, the present world would not be large enough to hold the volume.

The Student desires to be told how Father Gibson knows that St. Peter was ever in Rome. Well, he knows as by means of several acquirements which Presbyterian preachers rarely possess. In the first place Father Gibson is an educated man who has received the classical education of a scholar as well as the ecclesiastical education of a Priest of the Church whose chief Blessed Lord placed St. Peter at the first Pontiff. Secondly, Father Gibson's mind is stored with much of God's truth which would be a stranger in a strange place if in the mind of a sectarian minister. Thirdly, Father Gibson is a linguist who can read ancient manuscripts and printed books in tongues that would puzzle a Presbyterian preacher far wiser than would a Chinese Dictionary bewilder a Chinook Indian! In a word, Father Gibson can sip knowledge from many a fountain, the waters of which are frozen up to the half-shell theologians of the topsy-turvey sects. We hope, therefore, the Student has acquired knowledge on this point.

The fact that St. Peter lived in Rome and had his See there, can be proved from the Holy Father when celebrating his Jubilee Mass. Mr. P. L. Enlightening Presbyterian Ignorance.

An article appeared in the Student last week, in which a very silly attack was made upon Rev. William Gibson, the gifted rector of St. Anthony's church, Brooklyn, and as Father Gibson is present down on New York, we will not see his statements called in question by any enemy of the Church, and yet, without defending him to the best of our ability.

The Student, in its account of the private last controversy which Father Gibson had recently with a certain Dr. John Thompson of Oakland, gives it Methodist brethren a dig under their short sectarian rule, after the following fashion:

"The children of the Methodist Church at a late conference in Oakland, had to discuss a question which directed their thoughts to the Roman Catholic Church, and some statements were made which, being published, have called forth a reply from Mr. Gibson, a Roman Priest. In a long communication in the Oakland Tribune, Mr. Gibson fairly demolishes Dr. John Thompson general secret of the bible. Not only has Mr. Gibson shown that Dr. Thompson has not the slightest knowledge of the Scriptures, but he has shown that Dr. Thompson, and so forth."

In the part of Father Gibson's letter which we have taken to Heavenly Father, we find that Dr. Thompson's ignorance of the Scriptures is so great that he has not even a general knowledge of the Bible. Not only has Dr. Thompson not the slightest knowledge of the Scriptures, but he has shown that Dr. Thompson, and so forth." Dr. Thompson's ignorance of the Scriptures is so great that he has not even a general knowledge of the Bible. Not only has Dr. Thompson not the slightest knowledge of the Scriptures, but he has shown that Dr. Thompson, and so forth." Historical Sketches of Irish Landlords.

In contrast with the admirable character of the tenant farmers of Ireland, which we delineated last week, we present a few extracts from writers upon Irish landlordism as it has operated in Ireland throughout the greater portion of the present century, during which time it has done so much to stay the domestic prosperity of the Irish people and to drive the honest, hard working, industrious, and thrifty tenant farmers into the poor houses, thus, any other power at work for the improvement and thrift of the Irish people.

Just one feature about Irish landlordism in Ireland is found in the fact that it is not an institution, civilized and Christian, but a barbarous one, which in English annals has disgraced

The landlord of an Irish estate, called to his aid a Protestant clergyman, who was not a bigot, who could not be induced to shoot down the poor Catholics on land that of them and all living relations of equity and pity, by very many illegal acts, and by very many illegal acts, and by very many illegal acts, and

Farm and Home.

"Bound-Shouldered" Children

"For someone past," says Dr. Tullio de Santos Verdi, in the Washington Star, "I have noticed children from the age of ten to fifteen growing round shouldered, and I believe it to be due to the careless training of parents, and I account such among in many instances. Thus, morning, however, I noticed four children of the same family (boys and girls) all round-shouldered, and inquired of the parents the cause of this abnormalities condition. I was told these same children had become erect during three weeks they had been detained from school, on account of measles in the family, but they had resumed their bent appearance a few days after their return to school. Inquiring further the children informed me that they were required to sit in school with their arms folded across their chests, for the purpose of doing their studies.  Such a posture during the time of physical development, maintained daily for many hours, will cause the growing ribs and sort lapse to adapt themselves to its requirement, and the stoop of the shoulders and the contraction of the chest finally to become permanent. This would not only distort the natural shape of man and woman, but deprive them of the free exercise of blood and air so important to life. It is bad enough that children should have to sit quietly five or six hours a day, but that they should be kept in positions which prevent the development of their chests is almost incredible."

For the Laundry.

—Use buttermilk to take out mildew stains.

—A teaspoonful of turpentine boiled with white clothes, greatly aid in the whitening process.

—As far as possible iron by the thread, pull the material straight, and move the iron in the direction of the thread of the cloth.

—To take ordinary ink out of linen, dip the ink spot in paste made of tallow, wash out the tallow and the ink will come with it. This seldom fails.

—To set the blade in home-school wooden goods, so it will not want, wash the wood or goods over night in sweet milk, rub it out and dry, then rinse well through water, and the color will be as fast as it can be.

—Bluing.—Take one ounce of soft Prussian blue, powder it and put in a bottle with one quart clear rain water, and add one half ounce pulverized oxalic acid. A tablespoonful is sufficient for a large washing.

—Both white and colored dress goods can be so washed that they will never shrink. If, however, we want our material not to shrink or fade, we must keep the fibres of wool composing it from overlapping each other, and we must not rub it with anything, nor on anything. Instead of rubbing the soap on the goods, dissolve sufficient in a small amount of water; add this mixture to sufficient warm water to make good suds; allow the goods to be washed to remain in this suds until thoroughly soaked, when they may be washed by being drawn, not rubbed repeatedly through the hands. Rinse in clear water of the same temperature as the suds, by moving the garments briskly about until every particle of soap is removed. When hanging up, take care to stretch the garments to their proper shapes, and hang in the open air, or where the drying will be accomplished quickly. Every soap or the best imported Castile, is the best for washing flannels. It injures all kinds of hosiery and underwear to iron them. A fair trial of these very simple directions will effectually prevent the shrinking of woolen knit underwear, keeping the material soft and pliable until worn out.

Apples vs. Oranges.

In El Dorado county we have thousands of acres of first-class land neighbor-to-neighbor for the raising of apples, and the best apples in the world. Some of our people are beginning to realize this fact, and on the past season quite a good number of trees have been put out at stumpage ranging from $100 to $ 000 each. Most of this land is being offered at from $4 to $6 an acre. While in Placerville a few days ago, Hon. J. H. Miller of Latrobe, who has made his home in Sacramento for nearly a year, assured me that he could not buy a good apple tree for less than $1 75 a best, and that late in the season he had paid as high as $4 a box. With apples at the first price named, and land at present ruling prices, is it not the height of folly to buy orange land and grow that fruit?

New Style Barrels.

Barrels are now being made of hard and soft wood, each alternate stave being of the soft variety and slightly thinner than the hard wood stave. The edges of the staves are cut square, and, when placed together to form the barrel, the outsides are even, and there is a Vulcanized crack between each stave from top to bottom. In this arrangement the operation of driving hoops forces the edges of the hard staves into the soft ones until the cracks are closed, and the extra thickness of the latter causes its inner edges to lap over those of the hard wood staves, thus making the joint doubly secure.

Planting Orange Trees.

In the immediate part of Rotte, including Orcville, Tarsualto, Palermo, and Wyandotte, not less than 50 000 orange trees will be planted by the fin of May. Of these more than 20,000 are already in the ground, and not less than 200 men are at work planting; the others. Fifty thousand trees in bearing means a grand item for eastern Butte. It means employment to a large number of persons for years, and when the trees come into bearing it means the yearly shipment of 500 carloads of the golden fruit.

A Remarkable Yield.

Joseph Phillips, of Albert and Phillips creek, says that he expects to take off 1,500 tons of peaches, from 200 acres of the orchard this coming season. It such is to be the yield, and they were willing to sell on a contract now, for 2 cents a pound, they would receive $60 000 as the expense of picking and hauling to the Marysville depot, for the product of 200 acres. This would be equivalent to $300 an acre, and would probably net them more than $200 an acre. The trees are only about four years old.—Marysville Appeal.

Avarice Overreached.

A farmer of Washington county, Ill., just before taking a drove of hogs to the market, gave them a bot of salt and then fed the water they could drink. This was to increase their weight. Fourteen of them died on the road to town, and the smart farmer's little trick cost him just $150.

—Inspector Collector T. Vincent, N. H., the Postmaster found a pouch the other day which had been lost nineteen years, and which contained 118 letters for that city. There were then three registered letters with money in them, and their non-receipt had upset half a dozen offices.

Family Fun.

Never Use Slang.

"Miss Hastaur," said one of the pupils of an Indian boarding school to the school-ma'am, "we want to ask you a question before we recite."

"Certainly, my dears, ask as many as you like."

"Would one of we girls ever be justified for using slang?"

"Yes certainly would not," replied Miss Hastaur with quite a firmness.

"We frequently hear educated and cultivated people employ it in their conversation," insisted the young lady.

"That may be only too true, but it's no excuse. We cannot fall into the ways practiced by even the so called educated and cultivated. For my own part, I continued the principal, as she sat up very straight on the edge of the chair and glanced at the text book she held in her hand and again raising her eyes, "For my part I will allow the horrid blaze to whistle through my whiskers a long time before I will indulge in the use of slang."

He was Convinced.

An old man would not believe he could hear his wife talk a distance of five miles by telephone. His better half was in a country store several miles away, where there was a telephone, and the sceptic was also in a place where there was a similar instrument, and on being told how to operate it, he walked boldly up and shouted, "Hello, Sarah!" At that instant lightning struck the telephone wire and knocked the man down, and as he scrambled to his feet he excitedly cried: "That's Sarah sure enough."

He Knew.

A Sunday School teacher told his scholars that he would give a present to the girl or boy that who would bring in a new pupil. On the following Sunday a stout boy occupied a seat in the class. The lesson was on Pharaoh; the teacher asked, "Who was Pharaoh?" No answer. Presently the newcomer held up his hand. "Can you tell?" inquired the teacher. "Yes'm; he was the man what busted my pa."

Anything, So it's English.

Itinerant Vendor—"Fro's per nice fresh 'ot waffle, haways hinvigoratin' han' comfortin'."

Miss Anglos—"Oh, 'Tom' do let's stop and listen a little. I haven't heard such pure English since we left London."

A Slave to Appetite.

Revivalist—"Uncle Rastus, why don't you give up your evil ways and become a Christian?"

Uncle Rastus—"Use tried it, sah, I tes tried it. I'se sperienced religion mo'n once, but hain' got no."

"What seems to be the trouble?"

"I speeks I'se too fond o' chicken, sah."

Pungent Paragraphs.

Young physician, pompously—Yes, I've called at Mr. Brown's house three times a day for a week. He is a very sick man.

Miss Smith—"He must be by this time."

"Who was the wisest man?" asked the Sunday-School teacher.

"Solomon," promptly replied a little girl.

"And who was the holiest?"

"Moses."

"Moses. What makes you think so?"

"Because Paps calls him 'Holy Moses.'"

Grigg—"What on earth is the matter with that lady over there. Has she the St. Vitus dance?"

Briggs—"Yes, no; she's just trying to put on a new pair of corsets."

Parsimonious, in bed—"Is that Pryor's hangnail still in the parlor with Clare?"

Matrimonious, listening—"I think he is. Everything is very quiet down there."

Brown—"I say, Dowley, Robinson has threatened that his first born shall be named he propose to knock some horse sense into you. You want to look out for him."

Dowley (contemptuously)—"Pooh! It would take a dozen men like his Robinson to knock horse sense into me."

Minister (making a pastoral call)—"I reverence sir, my dear madam, to discover traces of tears upon your face. Sorrow, my dear Hendricks, that he whom the Lord loveth He chastoseth. If you would speak freely to me I might—"

Mrs Hendricks—"Oh it is nothing, Mr. Goodman. We are to have a boiled onion for supper and I have been peeling them, that is all."

"Bigsby, the lawyer, doesn't seem to be very lovable in your set."

"No, he has shaken me entirely."

"Why is that?"

"The other day I heard him making an argument before a jury and I was so impressed by his talk that I sent him a present."

"What was it?"

"A set of gas fixtures."

Husband (to wife)—"I've been out half the day trying to collect money, and I'm mad enough to break the furniture. It beats all how some men will put off and put off. A man who owes me money and won't pay it isn't fit to associate—"

Servant (opening the door)—"The butcher, sorr, is downstairs with his bill."

"Tell him to call again."

"Doctor—"Why, the skin's all worn off your tongue. How did that happen?"

Patient—"From hard work, sir."

"Impossible! Are you a sword swallower?"

"No; I'm a labor agitator."

"A clergyman is accused of being seen trying a cinch on a dog's tail." Well what if it is? Some people are unreasonable enough to expect that because a man is a minister he ought to tie other goblets to dogs' tails.

Philadelphia Lady—"How many times did you use the same piece of bridge?"

Bridget—"Only four times, mum."

Philadelphia Lady, severely—"Bridget, I am surprised! Go and wash them down again, at once."

Mrs Rabagoul—"I'm going shopping, Lobetia. Is anything needed for the nursery?"

Lobattie—"Oul, madams. Lobella Hardcold, eat pus cell—swallow how a rattle snake morning. Eet eas as silvere one wie as bells, madams. Possibly you can it march."

"My dear," said a dying man to his wife, "very handsome woman. When I am gone, will you erect a monument in my honor?"

"If you wish it," sobbed the lady; "but, I fear monuments are getting to be so common."

THE NEW BISHOP OF ACHONRY

A Striking Discourse Delivered at His Consecration by His Predecessor.

The new Bishop of Achonry, Most Rev. Dr. Lyster, was consecrated on Sunday, April 8th, in the Cathedral, Sligo, by the Most Rev. Dr. McEvilly, Archbishop of Tuam, the assistant Bishops being the Most Rev. Dr. Gillooly, Bishop of Elphin, and the Most Rev. Dr. Healy, Coadjutor Bishop of Clonfert, Master of Ceremonies, Rev. O'Connor. The Most Rev. Dr. McCormack, presided, and preached a sermon from the text, "I have chosen you and appointed you that you should go and should bring forth fruit and your fruit additional fruit." He said the Bishop-elect was called by the Vicar of Christ from the comparative obscurity of his college life, where his high intellectual gifts and his acknowledged talents had rendered long and valued services to his Bishop and his native diocese. He went forth from those college halls carrying with him the esteem and admiration of his colleagues and the affection of his pupils. It had been his good fortune to have served for a considerable period under a Bishop unsurpassed for zeal, unrivalled for his power of originating and organizing and adapting means to an end, a Bishop whose name should live in the Cathedral and in the other monuments of his labors which were to be found in the length and breadth of the great diocese.

The Right Reverend preacher rejoiced that the creator that he was called upon a few months ago to lay aside now passed into the hands of one so fitted to carry it. But his own brethren especially had feelings of enthusiastic joy when they saw one called upon to take rule and file of their own body, invested with episcopal dignity and the ministry, one of a flock of over a hundred thousand people. Speaking of the obligation of a Bishop to guard his flock from error and false teaching, he said at the present day the revolution of bad books and corrupt literature was doing a tentative mischief. What was called high class literature was in many instances nothing better. Sneers at revelation were becoming common. The superiority and self-conceit of science, and the emancipation of the human mind, were preached from the house-tops. Thoroughgoing indifference of the passions was confessed, if not self-justified. There were only a few of the poisonous fruits that had sprung from that land on called high class literature, and the mission of the Church was to guard against those dangers. Happily the Bishop-elect was equal to the task. He was a ripe scholar, and a well-trained theologian and legislator—one who was qualified to challenge false premises and correct false conclusions.

The other Bishops present were the Most Rev. Dr. Lynch, Bishop of Kildare, and the Most Rev. Dr. Woodlock, Bishop of Ardagh. In the afternoon the new Bishop was presented by the Rev. James Kelly, Athlone, with an address from the Priests of Elphin, in which grateful reference was made to those brilliant abilities which placed His Lordship in the front of his classes in that great national College of Maynooth, that abundant and rapid learning which increased through many obstacles years, that touching eloquence often heard with delight beyond the confines of their diocese, and the modesty which added a fresh grace to his high intellectual gifts. His Lordship was President of the Diocesan College of Elphin, His Lordship had placed the Priests under a tender and lasting debt of gratitude, and they wished him very many happy years, and with gentle and the mildness of manner of St. Nathy and the long line of learned and zealous prelates who had sat in Achonry, His Lordship, in reply, said his heart was too full for utterance. He was, in fact, a ripe scholar, and a well-trained theologian and legislator—one who was qualified to challenge false premises and correct false conclusions.

THE STATUE OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN.

It is Stirring Up a Lively Religious War in Canada.

The war that was waged by the Protestants here, says a Montreal letter to the New York Sun, on the Roman Catholics proposed the erection of a high statue of the Blessed Virgin, on Mount Royal, the Central Park of Montreal, has somewhat subsided. The Catholics say they had proved, so they have decided to erect the statue in Protestant quarters of the city. The Protestants object to the erection of the statue in any part of Montreal, but the Catholics are determined to erect it in all hands unless Queen Victoria interferes. It is said that a petition has been prepared to send to her Majesty asking her to interfere. Meanwhile Bridget Herbert, of Montreal, has the contract for the statue, and left for Paris, where the figure will be cast in parts and shipped to Montreal to be put together. It will take the sculptor three years to complete the work, but the fact does not seem to console the Protestants in the least, who are doing a great deal of jeering and no small amount of swearing.

The statue will be made of bronze and is to stand on a square pedestal two hundred feet high. The figure will be hollow, and an elevator will be provided for the curious public to the head. At night an electric light will shed a halo around the sacred form. As it is to be similar to the Bartholdi statue of Liberty on Bedlow's Island, New York, it is thought that M. Bartholdi will give the new statue the Parisian finis. The estimated cost is $100,000, the whole of which amount is nearly in hand. The original committee of twenty at its formation pledged two-thirds of the amount, one individual alone contributing $10,000. The committee was then enlarged to fifty, who succeeded in raising very nearly the whole amount. When the petition was first presented the Protestants saw it as a joke, because they thought it was legally impossible to carry out the project, and not a few of them signed it and actually contributed to the scheme; but when they found that there was no legal barrier, and that the Catholics meant business, they grew into the same state of excitement as a number of those who subscribed asked to be relieved of the obligation. Many of those of the Protestants who subscribed and still support the scheme is Sir Donald A. Smith, a philanthropist, who has strength enough away nearly half a million dollars in charity.

IRISH NEWS BY MAIL.

Antrim.

The death of the Rev. James McGuna, P. P., of Ballycastle, which occurred on April 11th, will be lamented with much regret. Deceased was a man of the people, and his death will be felt by the poor. In early life he was employed in the Customs, but he left it for the priesthood. He was ordained the first year of his married life his wife died, and he then decided to join the priesthood. He was Administrator of Dunfanaghy, and in 1875 was appointed to the pastoral charge of Ballycastle.

Carlow.

On Sunday, April 15th, another parish Bishop was added to the ranks of the Irish Hierarchy in the person of the Most Rev. Edward Maginnis, the new Bishop of Kilmore. The Archbishop of Armagh was the consecrating Prelate. Seven Bishops attended the solemn ceremonial in the Cathedral at Cavan, and the gathering of the present clergy and laity was numerous. A fellow student of the new Bishop, the Rev. Thomas Finlay, of the Order of Jesuits, preached the consecration sermon, and the youthful Prelate was placed among his priests and people with the whole-souled hearty cordiality which is the outcome of his great personal and happy episcopacy. His diocese has not a worthy bishop the loss of the late lamented occupant of the seat to which he now worthily succeeds. He brings to the ancient See of Kilmore, the strength of the suffragan of a faithful priesthood; and we are sure that his practical mind will grave teaming with good projects in the service of religion and country, in the united cause of which we cherish the hope that his elevation to the episcopal committee of twenty at his formation pledged two-thirds of the amount, one individual alone contributing $10,000. The committee was then enlarged to fifty, who succeeded in raising very nearly the whole amount. TIMES CHANGING.

How strange that loving souls below
Must but to part and meet no more;
Most in this world with spirits spleen,
Then pass to Paradise's bright pleasant shores.
And ever thus the world moves on —
We meet to-day and part for ages;
Ere we dream life's battle is won,
We sink to sleep, and then we die.

Yes, die; and are forgotten and fade
With the enchantress throng of old.
Whose nameless graves the silent glade
Creeps to its bosom free and cold.
Some souls that yesterday were strong
In dreams of joy and hope and pride,
Have fallen from the mortal throne;
And ceased to stem life's wayward tide.

The stars that shine in Heaven above,
Shone o'er our cradles fair as now;
True as our souls are pledged to love,
Those stars shall light each departing brow;
Why ponder on such passing themes,
The same routine through time has sped;
Our hopes are but a balmy dream —
Held fast to-day, to-morrow fled.

Ah, be morose, yes, to-day,
We may take time to a helpless shore,
For all the joys young and gay,
Must one day bear the boatman's oar.
Why chide the ceaseless flight of Time —
The changing years so fast they roll;
Each one is borne on winds sublime,
Each bears in mourner to the goal.

All earthly forms evolve in dust,
Our youthful loves all fade away;
Life's brightest scenes will change to rust,
Yet Hope and Faith are ever near.
Look back on all the bygone hours —
The unforgotten scenes of old,
When all our paths were strewn with flowers,
And hope our bosoms spirits bore.

Then let our days in peace pass by,
High not for what we cannot mend,
There is always a watchful eye
To whom is revealed our mortal sins
Bathe in the balm of Heaven's first ray.

A LESSON.

I wandered one evening, when twilight was stealing,
Along the fair margin that circled the brook;
And there in its beauty a lily was smiling,
Its head with a crook and discomposed look.

It shot up in beauty above the wild tangles
That threat'ningly hemmed it around and frowned
Like a planet from the skies it patiently flourished,
And prospered in quiet on alone ground.

With nerves I glanced on its virginal bearing,
Not a stain ever defiling its immaculate brow;
I eagerly drank its calming sweet odor,
That wholly and kindly enveloped me now

Long did I gaze on this spotless beauty,
Shedding its fragrance wherever I roam fair,
When, straight to my mind came a lesson and moral —

A lesson of truth and a moral most rare.

I saw in the lily the type of frail man,
Who, cast from his true home on high,
Now blooms 'mid the thorns of this valley of pain,
With the hope that his soul will not die.

Like the lily he thrives upon rude, sterile ground,
'Mid sensation, low luxuriance and greed,
Diffusing o'er earth an aroma of glory
Caught from a heavenly land.

Fair may he bloom in this garden terrestial,
His spirit with virtues celestial benight;
Oh, may he shine forth in angelic pure lustre,
Emphatically fair until Time's hour shall.

May his life on this earth be as fair and as spotless
As the lily that blooms undefiled by a stain;
So when Death shall disso e the body and spirit,
The pure pleasures of Heaven his soul may attain.

THE MOTTO OF MAY.

A song written 30 years ago by Cardinal Newman.

Green are the leaves, and sweet the flowers,
And dark the hour of May;
We see them in the garden round,
And market passers gay;
And a low murmur meets and lauze.
And alleys, we dancey,
By fateful gleams like fair sunshine,
The blue, transparent sky.

CHORUS.

O Mother mild, be then our aid,
Now in the opening year;
Cast sights of earth to sin give birth,
And better the Tempter near.

Green is the grass, but wait awhile,
Twill grow, and then will wither;
The flowers, brightly, as they smile,
Shall perish altogether;
The merry sun, yes sure would say,
It is cold and is gloom;
But earth's best joys have all an end,
And sin, a hery doom.

CHORUS.

But, Mother mild, then dost not fa'n;
With more alarm thy bear,
And the pale moon beneath thy feet,
Forever thrust set thou.

The green, green grass, the glittering grove,
The bower's and sylvic dome;
They image forth a tender bower,
A more enlighted home;
They tell us of that Paradise
Of everlasting rest,
And that high Tree, all flowers and fruit,
The sweetest, yet the best.

CHORUS.

O Mary, pure and beautiful,
Then art the Queen of May;
Yet affends wear about thy hair,
And they will never decay.

—The Oratory, 1890.

THE PRINCESS' PEARLS.

"The queen has given all her daughters her necklace of pearls."—English Court Gossip.

Ages, twice round the nation of your daughters,
Round the necks of your royal girls,
These gems from the deep sea waters,
These circlets of pearls!

As they rival each throat's lily whiteness,
Where quaver and dale in line convey;
Why they bloom in the radiant brilliance
Of ball-rooms or court —

Behold the red stain on their splendor!
The blood!—yes, the blood that hath flowed
For gem, from hearts true and tender!
These gems! foul abode

Was down 'neath the black, bitter waters
Of Erle's inhospitable and fierce,
Your pearls, O Victoria's daughters!
Are Ireland's tears!

Literary Miscellany.

Squire Shrimpup's Wife.

A Simple Story, Short and Sweet.

"I will not, and that's all there is of it."

The speaker was quite small and very girlish in appearance. She had a pretty face and the foot that she stamped on the yield ing carpet was fit for an artist's model. There was much of the Chinese mallness about it, without the cramped and bunchy look which compression causes. She was in earnest, and the wide-like lips through which the words of indignant emphasis were shoved that when she drew them into a pout and put her foot down something would have to yield, but not her resolution.

"The idea of marrying that horrid old man!" she exclaimed. "Why, he's old enough to be my father. And he's got a bald head. Ugh! And he has false teeth. Ugh! Ugh!"

And the young girl felt a cold shiver run over her body and escape at the nape of her neck, which made her throw her head back with a sudden jerk, and then she burst into an uncontrolable fit of laughter, which ran through the spacious mansion with the clear tone of a dinner bell.

"Oh, Jessie!" she exclaimed, "to marry Squire Shrimpup! I? Not I!" and then she laughed some more.

She was sitting at a grand square piano, but why she had taken that position did not appear, for the keys had remained untouched, and the stacks of music showed no signs of recent disturbance. The tact is she had intended to indulge her foolishness for instrumental music, but she got to thinking of Squire Shrimpup with his bald head and false teeth, and her purpose had vanished into an exclamation, followed by an unconbrollable fit of laughter. The setting rays of the sun, slowly sinking in the West, fell upon the large window sills of the parlor, and lit up the room with a soft, weird light. Jessie Onslow certainly looked bewitching as she sat upon the piano stool completely absorbed in her own thoughts.

"My dear, what are you thinking about?" Jessie started up. "Oh! how you frightened me, mother. What was I thinking about? What would you give to know, now?"

"Jessie was a great tease. Her mother smiled pleasantly and looked upon her only child with a thoroughly devoted expression and said: "Now, Jessie, how should I know? There are more dreams in the head of a girl 19 years of age than a Shakespeare could gather into reasonable coherence. You mean tease me."

"I'm not going to tease you. But would you really like to know the nature of the particular dream I was playing with when you disturbed me?

"I would, my dear."

"Well, I was dreaming of Squire Shrimpup," said Jessie, with a slow and deliberate emphasis. "He came near proposing to me."

Mrs. Onslow sat down in a chair, and Jessie ran to her assistance. She was much frightened. Her mother had fainted. Jessie rushed for some water, camphor, sulphuric —and in a short time she, with the assistance of two servants had brought the mistress of the house to consciousness. When the two were alone again, Mrs. Onslow said:

"I really believe I have heart trouble. The least thing sends me off into a fainting spell."

"You are not well, mother, and you must be very quiet."

"What did the Squire say, Jessie?

"Oh, he didn't say anything," said Jessie, not desiring to agitate her mother again. "But I want to know. I am all right now. Tell me, love.

"He said he was thinking of getting married again, and that he thought it was time I began to think of doing so, too. He seemed quite in earnest. He said I seemed so near and dear to him, and that he would like to see me happily married. He quite frightened me, because I couldn't think of marrying Squire Shrimpup. It's quite too ridiculous.

"Do you think, Jessie, that Squire Shrimpup intended to make a proposal of marriage to you?"

"I am very sure of it, mother, and he would have done so if I had not turned the conversation.

The tea-bell rang at this stage of the conversation, and mother and daughter left the room together. Jessie was almost convulsed with laughter at the idea of Squire Shrimpup's proposal, but Mrs. Onslow was more reticent and reflective than was usual with her. She was evidently displeased at what Jessie had told her.

"Could Squire Shrimpup have meant to propose to my Jessie" Mrs. Onslow asked herself time and again.

Squire Shrimpup was the great man of Flushing, where everybody spoke of him as "the Squire," but no one could have explained why. He had a flourishing law practice in New York, and made the journey to and from the city every day.

Squire Shrimpup was only 50 years of age, and a mighty well preserved and dignified old gentleman he was. True, he was bald headed, but he was too proud to wear a wig, and had only given way to the weak-ness for false teeth because a man is considered unmatiurate his food, and this cannot be satisfactorily accomplished on the best regulated gums.

Charles Onslow and Thomas Shrimpup had been law partners for a great many years, and when the former died he not only succeeded to the law practice of the late firm, but was made a joint executor with the winder of his partner's sing estate. He had known Jessie since the time she was a little baby, and he entertained a real fatherly affection for her. He had always treated Mrs. Onslow with deferential courtesy. When his own wife had been dead some two years he began to see excellence in Mrs. Onslow which had escaped him before. During the past six months in particular their intercourse had certainly been different from that which characterizes friendship, and he had reached a point where he felt he could declare himself and hope that he would not meet with a refusal. Mrs Onslow was only 40 years of age and of exceedingly reserved and dignified manner.

When Squire Shrimpup called at the Onslow mansion after meeting Jessie, he was surprised and pained at the formal and chilly reception his received. All the warmth and cordiality seemed to have gone out of the house. Mrs Onslow in particular appeared determined to freeze him out. But Squire Shrimpup was too old and too wary a man to permit such a state of things to continue long without being explained.

Later in the evening an opportunity came to disperse the haze that enveloped matters. Jessie betook herself out of the room, as she was accustomed to do, leaving her mother and the Squire to their own devices, and shut in the past, she thought, been agreeable enough.

"My dear Mrs. Onslow," said the Squire, "may I ask for an explanation of the extreme coldness and reserve with which you have received me to-night?

"Mr. Shrimpup, you will please excuse me. I am sure I have no explanation to make to you. A man of your age and position is ashamed to trifle with the affections of a young girl, and that, too, without obtaining the consent of her mother."

Squire Shrimpup looked aghast for a moment, and then, when the truth dawned upon him a huge wave of laughter swept the broad surface of his lobster countenance.

"My dear Mrs. Onslow, it is a mistake, I assure you. I had no intention of trifling dear little Jessie's head. Indeed, I was speaking to her purely in a fatherly way. If she thought I wanted to propose to her I am sure she misunderstood me in a most reprehensible manner. I never thought of such a thing.

Mrs. Onslow made no reply to this general denial that could she say? The Squire had always been very honest and frank in all his dealings with her, and she had cause to regard his word as in some sense law.

The Squire took a seat nearer Mrs. Onslow.

"I told Jessie I was thinking of getting married again. So I am," he said. "But, my dear Mrs. Onslow, and he dropped his voice almost to a whisper, "I was not aware that I was minded to marry me."

There was a moment of intense silence, and Mrs. Onslow blushed a great many pa and original shades of red, for while she had long expected such a result, she had actually did not anticipate it under the existing circumstances.

"You will have to give me time to think it over, Mr. Shrimpup," she said, without any resolution whatever.

"Why think it over, Mrs. Onslow! and he took the hand nearest him and held over it with courtly gallantry.

And the widow relented.

A few days after, Mrs. Onslow picked up courage to tell Jessie the news. She hardly knew how to go about it, especially after the conversation she had with her daughter about the good man, but it had to be done.

"Jessie, dear, I am going to get married again."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the young Miss, and her astonishment was perfect. "I didn't know you were thinking of anything of the kind."

"I hadn't been, my dear."

"Why, I suppose, I ought to be pleased, mother. What was changed mind?

"Jessie, Jessie, you mustn't be rude. I am sure you will like him very much. He is going to be Mr. Shrimpup."

"Mr. Shrimpup!" and Jessie went pomplly into a solid form of hysteria. When she had recovered her composure a little she exclaimed, "Well, that will be just too ridiculous!"

But she became reconciled to the match, and even overlooked Squire Shrimpup's hairless head and false teeth.

CATHOLIC SCIENTISTS.

Some of the Distinguished Attendants at the Recent French Congress.

This Congress divides with the national pilgrimage to Rome the attention of the Catholics of France. Your readers are already aware of the object and the scope of this Congress, and I shall accordingly merely say that over one thousand adhesions, among which are those of nearly twenty Cardinals and nearly one hundred Archbishops and Bishops, have been received by the organizing committee, and that, despite the difficulties of the undertaking, there is every prospect of a measure of success such as even the most sanguine of the promoters of the scheme scarcely dared to hope for. From France two members of the Academy, Messrs. Perraud and the Duc de Broglie, several eminent members of the Academy of Sciences, such as the talented Jesuit Father Secchi, and M. Wallaby of the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences, of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres, and of the Institute, together with professors from the Catholic universities and seminaries, are now in Paris engaged in the work of the Congress. From Belgium come the illustrious Dumont, Father de Smedt, S. J., the Baron de Gerlache, Governor of the province of Hainaut, Monsieur M. Kurth, the historian, and several professors from Louvain. From Spain are represented by Dr. Orueta, the Rector of Madrid University; Holland by Dr. Cornelis Wenz, the editor of the Tamid Bode; Italy by Mgr. Vinati and Mgr. Barberis, editors of the Roma Thomas, a philosophical review founded under the auspices of the Pope himself; Commander J. B. de Rossi, of Rome, the historian of the Catacombs, his father, the geologist, unfortunately having been prevented almost at the last moment from attending. Then, not to lengthen the list unnecessarily, the British Isles are represented by Mgr. Vaughan, Father Kelly and Father O'Mahony, of Dublin; Mr. Wilfrid Ward, the son of the famous Dr. Ward of the Oxford movement—the only Oxford don who was publicly defended from his professorial chair because of his religious tendencies—and last, but not least, Father Parkinson, S.J., of Stonyhurst. Mr. Ward has been elected to the Directing Committee as a compliment to the part taken by English-speaking Catholics in the Congress. Even distant America has representatives in the persons of Mgr. O'Reilly and Father Walsh, of Indiana.

In less than a year this specialist of the public health service of the Catholic Church, we are to be the victim of a blessed death. Why do we say so going?

"No," replied Mr. Allen: "I must spend next evening at home.

"Better go," urged Mr. O'Neil. "They're nothing good sellers. Let me see if I've got a dollar. Fifty, seventy-five, eighty-five—

Mr. Allen had also begun to feel in his pockets, and he supplemented Mr. O'Neil's efforts by saying: "If you've got eighty-five cents we can make the dollar.

So the two members started off to hear the Bishops without any intention beyond being entertained. The subject of the double lecture, as the Congressmen found out after taking their seats, was temperance. The gifted prelates handled it with rare ability. By the time Bishop Ireland was through, the audience, largely made up of church people, was on fire.

Then Bishop Keane came forward, and his utterances further excited the listeners. As he concluded his impassioned appeal he called on all to take the pledge of total abstinence for one year. Two-thirds of the crowd crowd arose without a moment's delay.

Then the more thoughtful began to get up one after another. Bishop Keane kept on talking, striking sparks from his cerebral fire, and with every sentence. Pretty soon there were scarcely half a dozen people left sitting. Two of the others were the two Congressmen. Under the lively exhortations of the Bishop the situation began to grow embarrassing to those who were holding out. Mr. Allen looked at Mr. O'Neil and Mr. O'Neil looked at Mr. Allen. Mr. O'Neil looked back appealingly and shifted uneasily in his seat. Mr. Allen straightened up as if about to get on his feet, and Mr. O'Neil dropped his head. Mr. Allen looked back when he saw Mr. Allen hadn't risen. After two or three false starts, which Mr. O'Neil duplicated, Mr. Allen, with a look of determination, took his place among the fallen. Mr. O'Neil followed.

The good Bishop uttered some congratulatory remarks and continued his lecture to be true in the good results they had taken.

The two Congressmen, after they got to the stand, took another pledge, and thus gave a fine example of bravery so to the by they had been caught.—St. Louis Globe Democrat.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 23, 1888.

Some Wesleyan Whoppers from Walnut Creek!

Our attention has been called to a letter published recently in the Oakland Tribune, over the signature of A. Holbrook, and issued from the classic regions of Walnut Creek, Contra Costa County. The gentleman who contained this specimen of polemical patch-work is, we presume, a Methodist preacher, and he sends forth the curious literary combination as a sample of Father Gleeson's article published in the MONITOR of the 2nd inst. But, by one of those tricks so peculiar to Methodist parsons, Mr. Holbrook purposely avoids meeting a single objection set up by Father Gleeson! Father Gleeson demanded proof from the Methodist preachers whom he quivered, for several of their charges against the Catholic Church, but he sought as well and thoroughly to wrap, as to ask Methodist preachers to give any respectable authority for a single calumny which they are constantly hurling against the character of the Bride of Christ.

Our long experience in defending the Catholic Church against assaults of Mr. Holbrook's calibre, places us in the position to say, without fear of contradiction, that Mr. Holbrook is a plagiarist of the worst type, as, in his letter to the Oakland Tribune, he has strung together a lot of nasty old calumnies which originated over thirty years ago in the brain of a fanatical firebrand in Boston, and which have been rehashed a thousand times since as the exploded productions of a Scotch plagiarist. Methodist parsons as Mr. Holbrook: From "Romanism in America," by Rev. Rufus W. Clark, and issued in 1855, Mr. Holbrook stole many slanders which he hurls at the Church of God. Every calumny he cites has long since resolved into dust under the trenchant pen of that powerful Catholic controversialist, Orestes A. Brownson, who so aptly and so thoroughly gave to the vile book in which the satanic writer first set forth the calumnies Mr. Holbrook exhibits as the result of his own research, than Brownson buried the palpable informal inventions beneath the weight of his truthful testimony, aided by his learned and logical mind.

It is in this way that Methodist preachers purloin the pestiferous literary putridity of the past in order to garnish their daring falsehoods in the present day. Yet this is only natural, as Methodism, being a system of religious novelty, is entirely to the Catholic Church in consistent in its calumniating influence, and the conduct of its preachers in manufacturing and circulating falsehoods of a century ago shows how shallow brained these sectarian slanderers are, and how they prostitute their talents when their sinful fanaticism:

The second source from whence Mr. Holbrook drew his inspiration, we trace to a dirty, disreputable Orange hebdomadal, issued in Washington City, and styled the American Protestant, in every issue of which may be found nearly all the calumnies which Mr. Holbrook injects into his scissors-and-paste-pot production so his own.

When Methodist preachers resort to such disreputable "dodges" in order to defame the faith of their Catholic neighbors, every intelligent citizen—Catholic and non-Catholic alike—will easily understand the weakness of Wesleyanism in its efforts to saddle its home-made slanders upon the Catholic Church.

Who are the witnesses whose evidence Mr. Holbrook arrays against the Catholic Church? An apostate priest and a lot of scurrilous sectarian scavengers whose bad books and bad papers are a stench in the nostrils of all decent people—irrespective of race, creed, or previous condition. Suppose Mr. Holbrook was defending Christianity against an infidel, and has attempted introduced the testimony of Voltaire, Thomas Paine, or Robert J. Ingersoll, in order to show the inconsistencies of Christianity, what would Mr. Holbrook say to such evidence? He would very justly consider that the evidence of the avowed enemies of Christianity was as weak as would be the testimony of Loufer against the justice of God in hurling him down to hell from his high throne in heaven!

Intelligent non-Catholic people have no respect for the fulminations of fallen priests, "escaped nuns," or such periodic lating peddlers of the rotten putrescence of their own corrupt imaginations. The "soiled dove of God's sanctuary lost her reputation for conscientiousness and truth when they fall from grace and grovel in the cesspool of worldly sensualism. Chiniquy and Hyacinthe, Gavazzi and O'Gorman, and all the other cutter-snipes whom sectarian preachers put forward as witnesses against God's Church, are all children of the Father of Lies, and God would not be God if the Truth were in them!

Many of the calumnies which Mr. Holbrook rehashes among his "whippers" from Walnut Creek, have all been refuted hundreds of times already, but when once a Methodist preacher gets possession of any malignant calumny against the Catholic Church, he carefully saves it as "a relic" of Romanism which he has sought for exhibition wherever the "brethren" meet in order "to make Rome howl!" But Rome has become so familiarized to seeing these nasty old slanders so often paraded in print, that she laughs at the light-headed, little-brained fellows, who use these old calumnious "chestnuts" with the absurd idea that such old-exploded falsehoods can excite any indignant feeling in the breast of that upon the minds of intelligent men. On the contrary, when impartial non-Catholics witness the poverty of ideas which so many Methodist preachers manifest, and the tenacity with which each of them clings to the same old lifeless slanders against the Catholic Church, they will naturally conclude that when the opponents of God's Truth can find no better charges to bring against the Catholic Church than stale old slanders that have been stamped out of shape a hundred times already, Methodist preachers have but a paltry case to bring before the intelligent American public.

WHIPPER NUMBER ONE.

We will now run through a few of the foreign-covered calumnies which Mr. Holbrook has dug up from the dead Annals of the Propagation of American and "Romanism in America," and which he has the impudence to parade as the result of his own literary prospecting:

The Shepherd of the Valley, the sickly journal of the Bishop of St. Louis November 21 1868, says: "If Catholics ever gain a sufficient numerical majority in this country, religious freedom is at an end."

In refuting this weather-beaten Wesleyan falsehood, it is well to call the attention of non-Catholics to the well-known fact that when the first Protestants dared to name fictitious bibles for themselves, they purposely corrupted the correct text handed down from Apostolic days and carefully preserved pure and undefiled by the guardians of God's Word in the Catholic Church. Under the manipulation of Luther and other creaders for sectarian schools, books of the genuine Bible were omitted from the Protestant version, some texts had their heads cut off, other texts were cut asunder in the middle, and some of them so transformed as to be made to mean almost the opposite from what Almighty God intended! These are positive facts!

The descendants of these drillers and dissecters of the Sacred Scriptures naturally learned the cunning lesson taught them by their predecessors in Protestant practices, and so, when the editor of the Shepherd of the Valley printed this paragraph in his paper:

"If Catholics ever gain a sufficient numerical majority in this country, religious freedom will be at an end. So say our enemies;"

it very naturally occurred to some malignant, necromancy Methodist preacher to rush his pen through the closing words—"So say our enemies," and to print the garbled statement as the invention of the Catholic paper designated. It was by this infamous means that the calumny was originating originated, and we ask intelligent non-Catholics what they think of slanders against God's Church which are manufactured in this manner and then paraded in print by Methodist parsons as evidence of the "dangers" which threaten the Republic unless Romanism is crushed beneath the wheels of the Juggernaut of Methodist falsehood.

When found on fanaticism become noisier, there is no limit to the lies they manufacture. Malice in a Methodist preacher's heart turns to ashes a pandemonium of passion, wherein the Father of Lies sits in judgment upon the Church established by Christ, and in this way the Holbrooks of heresy try to heaping their poor impotent malice against the Catholic Church, they use a lot of stale lies invented by Luther, and printing as their own a lot of rubbish which has formed the pabulum of hate a century ago, shows how shallow brained these sectarian slanderers are, and how they prostitute their talents when their sinful fanaticism:

WHIPPER NUMBER THREE.

The next flagrant falsehood which we find Mr. Holbrook has filched from the columns of the impious book and the unclean paper we have mentioned, is this:

"If the liberties of the American people are ever destroyed they will fall by the hands of the Catholic clergy."—General Lafayette.

No doubt it will astonish non-Catholics to know that Lafayette expresses exactly the contrary opinion to that cited in Mr. Holbrook's letter! The paragraph above has been surreptitiously extracted from a letter written by Lafayette when in Paris, to a friend in New York. The correspondence took place in 1829, shortly after the illustrious Catholic Freeboaster returned to his visit to this country. Here are the sentences in full from which the foregoing falsehood was fabricated:

"I cannot but admire your noble sentiments of devotion and attachment to your country and its institutions. But I must be permitted to assure you that the fears which in your patriotic zeal you seem to entertain,—that if ever the liberty of the United States is destroyed, it will be by Roman priests,—are entirely without any shadow of foundation whatever." (!!!)

Here we see the clever "father of Satan" again! Lafayette, as Mr. Holbrook has it, said that American liberty would be destroyed by Catholic priests, while Lafayette actually said that there was no danger whatever of such a calamity ever occurring! How careless it was of Mr. Holbrook to misquote such slanderous falsehoods from out the ill-smelling foam of anti-Catholic corruption which lodges down the pages of Romanism in America and the columns of the Orange organ yclept the American Protestant! But it is a singular fact that the anti-Catholic information possessed by all Protestant preachers is part of the old junk of dead-and-gone Knownothing days, and when the preachers of the present day attempt to show their intellectual prowess and research, they just re-hash the rotten rubbish of fifty years ago, and parade it out to the public as the freshest and most potent arguments against the Catholic Church!

For the information of those non-Catholics whom Mr. Holbrook has tried to bamboozle by means of his second-hand stolen slanders, we will append the closing words of Lafayette on this subject, as a pair of fire-brand fulminations from ranking Methodist ministers of themselves by pasting this transparent falsehood into the columns of some newspaper will be forced to a sense of giving additional weight to the justice of his opinion concerning the Catholic priests of America, and their fidelity to the principles of the American Republic, General Lafayette said:

"An intimate acquaintance of more than half a century with the priesthood and Catholic priests and members of that Church both in England and America, warrants me in assuring you that no such danger need be apprehended from the Catholic clergy in this country. The danger is your Republican institutions from that quarter."

There, Mr. Holbrook! What do you think of the criminal falsehood you tried to saddle on Lafayette? Evidently you imagined Romanism in America and the American Protestant to be inspired sources of information for anti-Catholic Orangemen and Methodist preachers. But no doubt your present experience will prevent your future pracy from that patrol source of Protestant "proof" against other principles or private of the Catholic Church in America.

WHIPPER NUMBER FOUR.

Pope Pius IX. extols his allegiance of September, 1851: "That he had taken that priests to be his. That the Catholic religion, with all its rights, ought to be exclusively dominant in such sort that every other worship shall be banished and tolerated."

Like all the other slanders which Mr. Holbrook hombugged the people of Oakland into paying, the above charge is utterly false, and we offer Mr. Holbrook or any other Methodist who desires to earn the reward of "one hundred dollars in Turkish or silver Englishe issued by Pius IX. in September, 1851, containing any such sentiment. These people who bring such charges against the Catholic Church, should always remember that Catholics keep in their vocabulary and dictionary the Ancient Orgies of all Encyclicals issued by the Popes, so, as we our misguided Methodist brethren useless trouble, we will inform them that Pope Pius IX., nor any other Pontiff, ever did use or could use the barbarously unpronounceable jabberish which Mr. Holbrook copied. The vile concoction is nothing but a badly-boughed forgery for the purpose of fraudulently deceiving the hopes of Methodist preachers who prefer those things from the rotten garbage heaps of the miscreants who originally manufactured them.

WHIPPER NUMBER FIVE.

"Undoubtedly, says Romanism Rome, 1854, "it is the intention of the Pope to place this country. In this intention he is aided by the Jesuits, who are now in the United States, and by the Propaganda, which is the Jesuits' Office for Foreign Parts." "It will be a great day for the Jesuits, if the order can, when, under the Stars and Stripes, establish, on school system, that is to be established in this country."

When Mr. Holbrook sent the foregoing two sentences from the scrap literature of Knownothing and Orange dealers (like Mr. Holbrook set, he tried to impress his readers with the idea that he had quoted from the original Catholic papers, Papal documents, magazines, etc., wherein he found every word he produced. For this reason he added these words to "Forbearance to quote Romanism" in the above sentences I will calculation [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Farm and Home.

Housekeepers' Notes.

—Table linen should always be hemmed by hand. Not only do they look more dainty, but there is never a streak of dirt under the edge after the hand-hemmed, as the machine sewing.

—Startling white "tidies" are not now scattered over chairs and sofas, as on so many bushes, or as if you were hanging out the wash to dry.

—Pungent are no longer much in demand and are a dead stock on the hands of the dealer in elegant household fixtures. Oak is the very latest rage. Desks, chairs, brackets, bedsteads, almost everything, is fast, are made of it, and it is the most fashionable of all the woods.

—Brass, copper or wrought iron nails are used in rows to fasten heavy wall coverings which will not easily retain their place if pasted. Nail effects are used very generally, and where needed they are useful and ornamental.

—Lincrusta Walton is used to fit up the edges of book-shelves or shoe-shelves in a bedroom. It is applied in a narrow band to plain pine shelves, and takes the same kind of stain—cherry, red wood or butternut—that the pine will take, resembling delicately carved wood.

—Yellow is prominent for all decorative touches. Wall papers, however dark in tone, have dashes of yellow, and in the extremely fashionable papers this color is shown throughout, if not in solid tones or precise dashes, it underlines the pink, blue or maize to such an extent that it shines out through the whole arrangement.

—Little bags for holding dust cloths are now made so pretty that one of them would be an ornament in everyone's room in the house, even in a corner of the parlor. They are made of crary material, from plush to pretty cretonne, with a flap to cover the pocket, which is ornamented with balls, and drawn through a large brass ring, by which the bag is hung up.

—Young housekeepers, who nowadays excel in their art, provide their housemaids with aprons, sweeping caps, dusters and dusting-sheets, all made of the same pattern of gingham or calico. This often is exceedingly good, and housework becomes pleasanter in say the least, with these inexpensive accessories.

Diphtheria can be Cured.

A priest who has had and opportunities of witnessing the ravages of diphtheria requests us do publish and give as much prominence as possible to the fact that so dread disease can be cured. He inclosed a slip from a Victoria paper, in which a correspondent says:

"Should you or any of your family be attacked with diphtheria, do not be alarmed, as it is easily and speedily cured with a gargle. When it was raging in 'Gasland a few years ago I accompanied Dr. Fields on his rounds to witness the so called "wonderful cures" he performed, while the patients of others were dropping on all sides.

The remedy to be so rapid must be simple. All he took with him was powder of sulphur and a gimlet, and with these he cured every patient without exception. He put a tablespoonful of flour of brimstone into a wine-glass of water, and stirred it with his finger, instead of a spoon, as the sulphur does not readily amalgamate with water. When the sulphur was well mixed he gave it as a gargle, and in ten minutes the patient was out of danger. Brimstone kills every species of fungus in man, beast and plant in a few minutes. Instead of spitting out the gargle, he recommends the swallowing of it.

"In extreme cases in which he had been called just in the sick chamber, when the fungus is too nearly closing to allow the gargling, he blows the sulphur through a gill into the throat, and when the fungus had sunk to allow of it, then the gargling. He has never lost a patient from diphtheria. If a patient cannot gargle, take a live owl, put it on a shovel, and sprinkle a spoonfuly or two of flour brimstone at a time upon it, let the sufferer inhale it, holding the head above it and the lungs will do. If plentifully used, the whole room may be filled almost to suffocation, the patient can wait about, inhaling the fumes, with doors and windows shut. This mode of fumigating a room with sulphur has often cured measles attacks of cold in the head, chest, etc., at any time, and is recommended in cases of consumption and asthma."

The Glory of Woman in her Hair.

Young girls of the present day complain by destroy their hair by crimping it with irons, and twisting it up tightly with thick, hard hair pins. This treatment may make the hair look pretty for the time being, but no thought is given to the ultimate result and the appearance it will present a year hence. The hair should be well brushed every night and morning with a moderately hard brush—brushes made with wire, and stiff-bristled bristles are the best—and on retiring to rest the hair should be drawn back lightly over the ears, plaited in one long plait, and allowed to hang down the back; it should not be fastened up with hair-pins, nor should any cap or covering be worn on the hair. This method makes the hair fine and glossy without the aid of oils or pomades, which are best avoided. The lower tier and hair pins used in dressing the hair the better, and twisted hair pins are injurious. It is not well to continue the same style of dressing the hair for two years in period, as it will become thin in some places; a change is a relief to the head, and wherever advisable. Cutting the hair occasionally is necessary, and should not be neglected.—Herald of Health.

How to Cut a Bottle.

The Boston Journal of Commerce tells how to cut a bottle: "Put the bottle on a level foundation and fill up with oil as far as you wish the line of separation to be. Next get a rod of iron as large as possible, but small enough to go into the mouth of the bottle. Make the iron almost white hot and dip it into the oil. In a very short time the sound of a crack will be heard, when the iron may be taken out, and the bottle will be found so neatly cut as with a diamond. Should the bottle be very thick and the sound of the crack not heard in a minute or so, a dash of cold water on the outside will settle the business.

Cure for "Ring-Bound."

At the first sign of a ring-round take a cupful of wood ashes, put in a pan with a quart of cold water, put the pan on the stove, put your finger in the pan, keep it there until the water begins to boil or as long as it can be borne. Repeat once or twice if necessary.

Burns and Scalds.

For a burn or scald, make a paste of common baking soda and water, apply at once and cover with a linen cloth. When the skin is broken apply the white of an egg with a feather; this gives instant relief, as it keeps the air from the skin.

A Stopper for Rats.

A correspondent says: Soak one or more newspapers, bind them into a pulp, dip the pulp into a suitable solution of caustic acid. While wet, force the pulp into any crevice or hole made by rats or mice. Rat soft—a disgusted retreat, with sore mouths and feet, on the part of the world he intenders. Professum est.

Family Fun.

Pungent Paragraphs.

"What are the last teeth that come?" asked a Lynn teacher of her class in physiology. "False teeth, ma'm!" replied a boy who had just waked up on the back seat.

Judge—"Madam, what is your age?" Shee—"Your honor, I leave that to the mercy of the court."

A little boy and girl were playing together, when the boy put a match in his mouth. "Oh, don't swallow it!" screamed Mary. "It'll scratch on your bones and go off."

Little Mabel was sitting next to a very thin, small man in the horse-car. She leaned over to her mother and whispered: "Mamma, I guess God must have made that man on a rainy day." "What makes you think so, dear?" "Cause he doesn't look as if there was much dust handy."

Mrs Dompsey—"John did you mail that letter I gave you last week?"

Mr. Dompsey (greatly confused)—"My dear, I—I will to tell the truth, I forgot it."

Mrs. Dompsey (overjoyed)—"How glad I am! Simon Tweale, Mrs. Tiesling has been divorced from her third husband, and I devoted three pounds sterling to congratulating her on her marriage!"

Society Dame—Who is that young man who is so attentive to you now?

Great Belle—He is a poet.

"Mercy on us! And do you, the proud daughter of a hundred millionaires, propose to throw yourself away on a poor, miserable starveling of a poet?"

"Oh! he isn't that kind of a poet. He writes soap advertisements."

"My own, own daughter, after all. Ask him to dinner."

Papa's Peculiar Changes.

"The first baby when she needs her first new shoes hears this from her proud and happy father:

"And does t want some little shoe one for its little foot nose? Wall, papa shall get it all the shoe-nuss it wants, so he shall.

When the order for the second pair shows he seems a little surprised and says:

"What! Hes papa little girl wore out its pretty new shoes so soon? She is a little rogue, so she is, to kick out her shoes so.

Before the child is a month older her toes are to be seen through her third pair of shoes.

"What!" cries papa when he is informed of the fact. "Wall, I'd just like to know how in thunderation that youngster kicks out her shoes so fast. She wears out more shoes than I do. She'd break up a bank president at this rate.

When the fifth pair is needed, Papa observes:

"Wall, if this don't beat everything. I'd like to know if I've got to get that young man a pair of shoes every day of his life? I'm tired to death of this thing, Clara. If she wants another pair this month she can take the pennies out of her bank and buy 'em. I won't."

Poor Papa.

Driving a Bargain.

The ineptitude of the female mind (in rare instances, we mean) to take a comprehensive view of a business transaction is marvellous. At a dry-goods store in Lecanty recently a woman called for some scrap of something, which we will not attempt to describe because we could not. She was told that the piece, containing two yards, would cost her 30 cents. Then the following conversation took place:

Customer—"Oh, I don't want a whole piece, how much is it by the yard?"

Saleswoman—"Why, have to charge 5 cents a yard when we cut it."

D.—"Five cents! Well, I guess seven yards will be enough.

Here the stuff is measured.

S.—"Thirty-five cents, please."

C.—"How much is thirty-five?"

S.—"Three yards."

C (presumably mentally reckoning that ten times five are fifty)—"How much for the whole ten yards?

S. (dazedly, but with an eye to business)—"Oh, you could have the ten yards for 50 cents."

C.—"Very well. I guess I'll take ten yards." (Plunks down 45 cents and departs satisfied.

Why She was Dressed.

Husband—"What are you rigged out for now?"

Wife—"I'm going shopping and want to be treated with respect."

"Humph! Go shopping in all that finery and you'll be charged three prices for every cent's use."

"I can't intend to buy anything to-day. I wear my old clothes when I buy."

A Heart-Breaking Discovery.

Anxious Father—Why, what's the matt ter?

Little Son—Ma and Dick was playin' as was Abe Lincoln and splittin' rails, an' was we got that big board all chopped up nuseus came out an' took it in for kindlin'.

"But you didn't want the wood, did you?"

"N-no."

Then what are you crying for?

"I'm just frazed out!—I ain't been playin'. I'd've been workin'—boo, hoo!

Not Married.

A Congressman dead against woman's rights was talking to a delegate to the International Council of Women.

"Why," he said "you women can't be men, you can't vote, and you can't fight."

"Can't fight! ma's ma!" she said with a cold glare in her eye. "You are a bachelor, aren't you?"

He was.

A Sensible Move.

Passenger (to stranger)—"Minister of the Gospel, I imagine, Sir?"

Stranger—"Yes Sir. I have been a minister of the Gospel for forty-two years, but I expect to retire soon."

Passenger—"Ah, that is a very sensible move, sir. I think when a man has made enough money in his business he ought to get out of it and enjoy himself.

The Installment Plan.

"Yes sir he committed suicide on the installment plan. How's that?"

"He moved from Chicago to New York, then to Cincinnati, then to St. Louis, when he took to beer, then whiskey, next to a 5-cent eating house for his meals, and finally bought a cigarette smoker. What else can you call it?"

Women's Way.

She—"Yes, dear Henry and I have made all arrangements, and we are to be married next month."

Another She (who had designs on him herself)—"I do so wish you will be happy, dear. But how did you ever manage to encourage enough to ask him."

ORPHAN ASYLUM FIRE.

St. Vincent's and San Rafael Narrowly Escapes Entire Destruction.

SAN RAFAEL, May 19th.—This morning a telephone message was received from Father Bastian, stating that a fire had broken out in the Orphan Asylum, stating that it is hard to tell where it started in the Asylum at 10 a. m., adding that the San Rafael Fire Department had been sent for by telephone. The message was promptly answered by the Fire Department of this place. When the Asylum was reached it was found that the old shed, recreation parlors and dormitories, situated in the northwest portion of the recreation grounds, were on fire in many places. Assistance in the vicinity of the Asylum had already gone to the rescue, but owing to the lack of water, and saving no ladders, were unable to combat the flames with any great success.

Chief Moreland on his arrival directed that a stream from the Fire Department be started to save the main buildings, in which were situated the dormitories, schoolrooms, bakery and dining-rooms, which owing to the constant changes of the wind, were in danger of being ignited. The water supply was found very inadequate for an institution of its size, and it was some time after the Fire Department arrived, before the steam pumps were in working order. The increased volume of water directed on the buildings adjoining the fire made a marked change in the progress, and after two and one-half hours of hard work they were pronounced safe. Our correspondent visited the scene of the fire on Sunday. During the progress of the fire, a panic was started in the upper end of the yard, where 500 boys were collected. Father Bleishart saw that he could do no way control them, and he ordered that the front gate be thrown open. The gates were opened and the inmates rushed forth like a flock of frightened sheep. They scattered over the surrounding country, traveling in all directions. After the boys had been pressed out of danger a survey was made of the grounds, and it was found that over 300 feet of the main building were a total loss, only the chimney of the kitchen remaining to show the place where the kitchen was located on Sunday. The boys were fed at noon, and provision made for lunch, and it was found that over 300 failed to answer to their names.

From reliable sources the information was received that the fire was incendiary. One week ago, John Ward, Tom Sullivan, John Kelly and Joe Donahue, a blind boy, made an attempt to escape, which was frustrated by some of the teachers in charge. It is supposed that, owing to their capture, they had planned this scheme to escape. The incendiaries had dug a hole in the soft ground outside the parlors and placed a quantity of dried twigs and straw under the building, which they ignited this morning, with the above results.

The loss on buildings and material destroyed is estimated at $10,000, partly covered by insurance.

The boys who escaped are being taken in charge as fast as they arrive in San Rafael, and already about 100 have been brought in by officer Donahue referred depot, awaiting transportation to the Asylum.

CHEAP BUILDINGS.

Help to Solve the Problem of Homes.

How to have a home of his own is the problem that millions in this and past ages have been vainly trying to solve. Then we hear the great cities in the very last hitherto have the great control over the people, at least of those in general and will be the only demand indispensable. Many have tried to solve the problem and to suite themselves, desirable and happy. Another those who have labored in this direction, John F. Clark has been one of the most successful. Many say that is house building the wonder age has been exceeded by that of iron and stone; but in this city, at least, the wooden age still shows its hold for one, in the commercial sections of San Francisco, of wood, stone, brick and iron necessarily hold away; but outside of that some of the most beautiful homes in the world rear up as the result of the efforts of the architects.

Mr. Clark has established his experience in some of the best building architectural ideas on a scale that has had all the practical knowledge and experience of thirty years from such adverse opinions, extending over a period of eighteen years. In almost every town or city in the State he has had charge of work, and his name is identified with the best of the best buildings, both public and private, in California, and we are pleased to present his name to our readers and the public generally. At present Mr. Clark is actively engaged in the erection of a large residence in the Mission—namely, the new St. Mary's College, Oakland, the new residence in Oak County, and also San Francisco.

The Clark cottage is entirely worthy of attention in a new departure initiated by the proprietor in a new departure initiated by him for the purpose of propagating plans and estimates for the erection of dwellings and villa residences in and about the vicinity of moderate means. He aims, a laudable one, to ward off by careful drawings and composition of outlay, elegance in design, and every possible economy, ease in interior arrangement.

Mr. Clark is a young man, and energetic and capable, as already proved by his work. Persons desiring to see the cottage can call at his residence, Oak and Fillmore streets, or at his office, 1 Montgomery Block, and see the plans and estimates. Mr. Clark's building, corner of Powell and Eddy streets, opposite the Baldwin Hotel, where he has a lot, is to be let out lately. In view of the increase of our population in California, he has opened an office at Room 20 and 27 Bush, near Bush, Broadway, between 9th and 10th streets, Oakland.

—The Fourteenth Annual Convention of the Catholic Young Men's National Union of the United States will be held on June 6th and 7th at Cincinnati, Ohio.

The new and handsome Catholic Church at Cootehill is now nearly completed, and the dedication of the sacred edifice is fixed for Sunday, the 30th of September next. The preacher on the occasion will be the patriot Bishop of Meath, the Most Rev. Dr. Dudley, and a large attendance of clergy is assured. It need scarcely be added that the successful close of the work will cause the brilliant joy to the esteemed and popular pastor, Father John Boylan, who has devoted years of anxious labor to secure the success of the project. It will also be hailed with sincere gratulation by many friends and co-workers in America.

Clare.

At Kenis, on April 22, Mr. Jas. Halpin, Poor Law Guardian, of Newmarket on Fergus, was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, without hard labor, for taking part in the land agitation at Kenis. Notice of appeal was given.

Carlow.

Lieutenant Colonel J. H. Keogh Kilbride, of Ball, died on Sunday, April 22d. He was the only Protestant landlord in the county of Carlow, of principles, and latterly endorsed the National programme. His connection dates back to 1798 the Liberal interest, but was defeated by a small majority. The farmers showed by some of the hundred for voting for the return of the priests and people.

Cork.

The election of Councillor for the North East Ward, by-election of Cork, on April 23d, and the results, called off on April 23d, and the result was a gain for the Nationalists, the sides worked hard for their man, and the "Princes" ladies made strenuous efforts to secure the victory for Mr. J. C. Enos, the Conservative candidate. The Nationalists Dalton, Lane, Mr. Alcock, junior, was beaten, returned by a majority of 1 for Mr. Enos, 200 votes, as against 199 for Mr. Lane, 198 votes.

The Most Rev. Dr. O'Callaghan has made the following appointments: Rev. Jas. Ryan, from the Diplomacy of the County Jail, to be chaplain to the Cork Barracks; Rev. John O'Mahony of Bishtown, to be chaplain to the Jail and to the Mercy Hospital; Rev. Jas. Arrose of Grammont Monastery, to be C. C. at Innisfeadig; Rev. Wm. O'Reilly, from the chaplaincy of the Mercy Hospital to that of Grammont Monastery; Rev. Sylvester Cullen, C. C., Mallestrane, to be C. C. at Newmarket; Rev. Jas. Ryan, Ballinadee, to be C. C. at Mallestrane.

Miss Brennan, daughter of the late John F. Brennan, M. P., and sister of the Rev. Michael Brennan, C. C., Ballinadee, to be C. C. at Newmarket; Rev. Jas. Ryan, Ballinadee, to be C. C. at Mallestrane.

Miss Brennan, daughter of the late John F. Brennan, M. P., and sister of the Rev. Michael Brennan, C. C., Ballinadee, to be C. C. at Newmarket; Rev. Jas. Ryan, Ballinadee, to be C. C. at Mallestrane.

Derry.

We regret to announce the death of Rev. Jas. Mellon, P. P., which took place lately, at his residence, Maghera. Deceased was ordained by Father Mullan filled the office of Curate in the Diocese of Meath and subsequently been appointed parish priest of Ballinderry, in succession to the popular and saintly Father McGough.

Down.

At an early hour on Sunday morning of Tuesday, April 17th, the premises of Mr. Francis McGuigan, Rathfriland, were found to be on fire. Strenuous efforts were made to save the grain in the stores, but without avail.

Galway.

The Stations of the Cross, recently purchased by Father Lally for St. Joseph's Church, Galway, were solemnly blessed on Sunday, April 15th. The Most Rev. Dr. McCormack officiated, assisted by Father Lally.

At the request of the Most Rev. Dr. Malachy Lothlahan of Tuam, the Very Rev. Father Lowe, P. P. of Knockbridge, Dundalk, Louth, will preach the annual retreat of the clergy in that diocese.

Lord Ffrench has just surrendered to the Fee of Ffrenghan in the county Roscommon, as were told the National League balanced with the law, and that the Ballinrobe and Ballinkillerig tenants who were leading to pay their rent in full and which was the question with their families, both been relieved from the impending ejectment. Lord Ffrench has generously made them to keep their rent up by their pockets until a substantial reduction was agreed to. Strange enough the rents don't agreed to a 30 more lowly by the removal of the obstacle; quite the contrary. Lord Dunsandle is one Ffrench from others in this, that, from the first to last and agent, the Hi-morals. Within Galway, antedated no angry feelings toward his tenants, even in the few ill-advised proceedings which he brought this county of which to the tenants in will have to apply. Accordingly, Joseph Lord Dunsandle was compelled to surrender, he was penalized, so to speak, to the extent of the amount of costs, which, in the case of the tenants, the landlord to pay all costs. The Hon. Wm. Daly would be the first himself to admit the moderation of the leaders of the movement. The tenants were not at present relenting, but both sides accepted Mr. Dillon's friendly mediation; so that Lord Dunsandle owes his rents to the meetings for which Mr. Dillon has been prosecuted. Will the Irish landlords ever learn that the leaders are not bombing, but holding back the people? It is only when they have got the leaders in jail that the landlords' real trouble will commence.

Kerry.

At a special Council court, held in Tralee, Monday, April 23d, before Resident Magistrate Massy, Resident Magistrate, a young man named Timothy Sullivan was charged with having a bullet in his possession. Sullivan said he found the bullet and thought it was a medal. He was sent to jail for three months with hard labor.

Kilkenny.

In April 19th, the old "Victoria Hotel," in Kilkenny, was closed up. It was once a famous house, and did a very large business. There is no sign of its being reopened. The result is, the "Imperial" and the "Club Hotel" are now doing a big trade especially the "Imperial" (Italian) which has fallen to be the resort of the Victoria crowd.

King's County.

An event unique and at times young men living near Birnagh been been announced for village assembly. The object consisted of meeting away manors from an united farm.

Leitrim.

On the 17th of April, the wife of the late Robert Dwan, Daniel Carr, John Holmes, Michael Cassaff, Patrick Mulvey, Andrew Nulty, John Reilly, Patrick Beirne and John Dorkin, who underwent imprisonment for participating in an alleged unlawful assembly, and were after Mr. Bellew, mayor of Dublin, left, and arrived in Carrick-on-Shannon by the five o'clock train. They were met at the station by a large concourse of people, and several bands of music were in attendance. A public meeting was held, and addresses were delivered by Mr. Mullins, Chairman of the Board of Guardians.

Limerick.

The season has been unusually dull up to the present, remarked to Limerick.

Mr. Thomas R. Bennett, of Hogg-street House, Ennis, has been appointed to the office of an injury received at the fleet Cottage.

Louth.

On Sunday, April 21st, the Most Rev. Dr. Leahy, Archbishop of Cashel, arrived in Dundalk on a visit to Father Kevin McKenna, and the Very Rev. Canon Connolly, V. G., Castlebellingham, were presided to the sacred order of priesthood. Father Kevin is a nephew to the late John Hughes proprietor to the Freeman's Journal. He is a young priest of great promise. Even so distant in the preparatory duties of the Pontificate at Maynooth, to Kingland.

Longford.

A meeting was held in Longford, on April 22d, which illustrates a phase of Nationalist movement as it may seem. An application was made on the part of the trustees of Maynooth College to have a receiver appointed over the estate of Lord Greville. In the counties of Longford and Westmeath, Lord Greville is a landlord to the extent of 17,000 a. The annual interest on the sum is 17,000 lbs., and Lord Greville is in arrears to the extent of 3,000 lbs. he has been obliged to borrow money from his friends to pay off a portion of the interest due. Of course his lordship's liability to meet this interest is nominal, and he could discharge the obligation he had to make his rents, and next, to the non-payment of any rent at all by a very considerable number of tenants. Now, what are the facts? It transpired during the hearing of the application that while the total valuation is 20,000, the gross rent amounts to 30,000, and the total rent payable—May, 8,8,4, 20,000. Mary, 8,8,4, 20,000. Mary, 8,8,4, 20,000. Mary, 8,8,4, 20,000. Mary, 8,8,4, 20,000. Mary, 8,8,4, 20,000. The reason for the application commented on the fact that while Lord Greville, the receiver, has taken steps on a valuation of 20,000, had, through his solicitor, asked for an abatement on the ground that he had made very large abatements and had received no rent whatever from a very considerable number of tenants! Comment on the "noble lord's" action is unnecessary.

Tyrone.

On Friday, April 27th, a most successful meeting was held at Ballygawley, County Tyrone, under the auspices of the Protestant Home Rule Association. The gathering was addressed by Mr. Thomas Sillinglaw, J. D. Fortashaw, and Mr. J. H. Oldham, B. A., Dublin. An Orange resolution was passed calling a counter-meeting, but Orange opinion being weak in the district the attempt collapsed.

Tipperary.

The Rev. Thomas Meagher, P. P., Nenagh, died on Sunday, April 27d, at the parochial residence, Nenagh. He was ordained, and at eighteen months ago for himself and his counterpart, Rev. Jas. Ryan, Ballinadee, which he presided over for many years, died. Deceased was a nephew of the late Rev. Jas. Meagher, Parish Priest of Cashel. The Rev. Thomas Meagher, as curate and parish priest, was a decided friend to the tenant farmer, by word and by deeds. In powerful appeals through the pulpit and on the platform, there was no law in the assembly parlor of that through which he was wont to do more to further the interests than he, or who was more affectual in the cause of tenants and friends to it. He was in his 75th year.

Waterford.

At Dunmurry, on April 24th, a farm held by the Rev. R. Carey and Mr. Daniel W. Carey was sold by the Sheriff of Waterford, under the landlord, the Duke of St. Albans, to a Land Commission for £10. Over £1,000 of the 200 had been expended by the tenants in improvements.

Wicklow.

The Rev. Canon Kirwan, P. P., died at his residence in Ballinacor, on Sunday, April 22d, in the 63d year of his age, after a illness of two weeks. For over twenty years, Father Kirwan worked assiduously, the last thirteen years being devoted to the pastoral charge of this immense parish. He was born at Kilbegs, county Wicklow, where he lived with his parents until he was sent to Maynooth, to studies in St. Patrick's College, Wexford. After a few years he was sent to Maynooth, where he had the honor of honors with marked ability and success. After his ordination he was appointed in succession to the curacies of Tenneck, Kilrane, Tarbow, Ballymore Eustace, and Ballinacor. In 1865 he was appointed parish priest of Ballinacor, and subsequently appointed parish priest of Tagoat in 1870 and in 1875 Chaplain to the Convent of important pastoral charge of New Ross, where he worked unceasingly and zealously for the welfare of those committed to his care.

ORPHAN ASYLUM FIRE.

St. Vincent's at San Rafael Narrowly Escapes Destruction.

SAN RAFAEL, May 19th.—This morning a telephone message was received from Father Kheinkort, at St. Vincent's Orphan Asylum, stating that a fire had started in the Asylum at 10 A. M., and asking that the San Rafael Fire Department be sent to his assistance. The message was promptly answered by the Fire Department of this place. When the Asylum was reached it was found that the old church, adjoining the school and clothes-room, already in the centre of a conflagration, and the problem was how to save the school and clothes-room. Neighbors in the vicinity of the Asylum were hurriedly on hand to the rescue, but owing to lack of water, and having no ladders, were unable to combat the flames with any great success.

Chief Mooshed on his arrival directed that the efforts of the Fire Department be exerted to save the main building, in which were situated the dormitories, schoolrooms, bakery and sleeping rooms, which owing to the constant changes of the wind, were in danger of being ignited, for no water supply was found very handy, except for the consumption of the steam engine, and thus allowed the Fire Department actively to work on the main building, which was saved. The increased pressure of steam directed on the building adjoining reduced it to a mere marked change in the proportions, and after two and a half hours' incessant labor they were pressed out of danger.

During the progress of the fire, the pipe burst, and a mere, quite a mule was started in the upper end of the pipe, where 500 feet were laid. Father Rheinkort saw that he could in no way control them, and he ordered the whole front gate to be thrown open. The time was opened and the immense crowd poured in a rush of frightened sheep. They scattered over the surrounding country, leaving in all directions. After the belongings were thrown out of the windows and piled in the grounds, and it was found that the school and the dormitories were a total loss, only the chimney of the clothes-room building remained standing, and the lower piles still burning. The boys were marshaled into the church, and a roll-call was taken, and found that over 200 failed to answer to their names.

From reliable sources the information was received that the fire originated in the room occupied by Master Ernest Sullivan, who made an attempt to escape, which was cut off by the time he reached the hall. It is supposed that, either tendency to smoke, or a lamp upset, caused the fire. The loss thereof is not yet known, but it is well covered under the policies of the Home, which they keep for such a contingency.

The loss on buildings and material destroyed is estimated at $5,000, partly covered by insurance.

The boys who escaped are from San Rafael, and charge as fast as they arrived to be sent home, already ninety two have arrived, by their parents, or friends, awaiting transportation to the Asylum.

CHEAP BUILDINGS.

Help to Solve the Problem of Homes.

How to have a home of his own is the problem that millions in this and past ages have been trying to solve. One of the greatest difficulties in the way has hitherto been the great cost of suitable buildings, or at least of those in general use and by the many deemed indispensable. Of late years, however, attention has been paid to quite cheapness, durability and beauty in the construction of buildings, and in this direction, John J. Ostrander, who was one of the first to introduce the idea, say that in house building the wooden shell has been supplanted by that of the wire lath, but in this city, at least, the wooden shell still holds the ground. In the commercial metropolis of San Francisco, of course, stone, brick and iron necessarily hold sway; but outside of that some of the most beautiful homes in the world grace up on the rental of the office of the architect.

Mr. Clark, who has gained his experience in some of the finest building architectural schools in the world, has had all the practical knowledge the most, has had all the latest improvements and approved designs, and has spent a period of eighteen years, in almost every quarter of this broad land, in the business of work, and his name is identified with many of the finest buildings, not only in Chicago and private, in California, and we are proud to have him as a citizen of our city and to the public generally. At present Mr. Clark is actively engaged in the erection of the largest edifice in the State—namely, the new St. Mary's College, Oakland; the Palace Hotel, Santa Cruz County, and also numerous residences in Oakland, Danville and San Francisco.

One feature eminently worthy of attention is his commodious and well-appointed lumber yard, which is a sight doubtless well worth a visit to the lumber yard, buildings and yards, for the selection of a house of moderate income to suit the fashionable one, is to all of by counsel, drawing and specifications of outlines, plans, designs, and every possible convenience in lumber or carpenter.

Mr. Clark is a young man, and energetic and capable, as already shown by the success of his place with those building modern eyes. His selection of materials is universally fine, and the chameleon with shaving Hardware and in the St. Ann's Building, corner of Market and Fifth streets, opposite the Baldwin Hotel, which is open from 1 to 5 P. M. and between 7 and 10 P. M. Mr. Clark's residence is at Room 9, and 7, Bet. per Block, Broadway, between 8th and 10th streets, Oakland.

Poetry.

SATURDAY MUSINGS.

Saturday night! and to-morrow comes rest—
Ah, the week now has almost passed;
Why, the hours are gone ere they notice have come,
And the days flew by too fast.

The old week dies, and the new is born,
And to-morrow our labors will cease—
When the prayerful music of the Sunday bells
Ring out with their greetings of peace.

One record more for the angel of life,
For the moved mysterious page
One gleaming day or one darkened night,
For the future's eternal age.

Are we happy to-night? are we evenly content?
Have we sow no vain regret?
Is there naught in the moments forever flown
We would fain then ever forget?

We are thoughtful and sad, we answer not,
When, in! on the midnight air,
Ring out the bells of the "Sacred Day"
With their pealing notes of prayer.

"Live again, live again," they seem to say,
What a strange sweet joy they impart;
"Live again at Calvary's sacrifice,
Live again in the Saviour's Heart!"

Oh, vain are regrets with no purpose strong,
To do and to dare for the right;
Every deep, I am sorry, is cold and stiffe,
In the darkness of Saturday night.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 30, 1888.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

— General Phil. Sheridan is reported dying. He is attended by a priest in Washington City.

— The reports of the speeches made by the Irish members in Ireland on Sunday last, show no respect toward the Pope, but not toward Bishop O'Dwyer, of Limerick, toward whom Wm. O'Brien was very bitter.

— President Fitzgerald and Secretary Sutton of the Irish National League have telegraphed to different members of the Executive Committee a call for a meeting of the committee at Cleveland, O. June 12th.

— The Spanish committee having in charge the Christopher Columbus celebration offers a prize of $10,000 for the best book in any language on the geographical discoveries of Portuguese explorers prior to the time of Magellan.

— A Boston paper says that a sneak thief took a pocket-book containing money and checks valued at $2,000 from a collector for the Methodist Book Concern. It is not often that money collected for the heathen reaches its destination so speedily and at so small an expense for commissions.

— Thomas Mooney, author of a "History of Ireland," and who was a resident of this State for several years, died in London last week, where he has since been the "Transatlantic" correspondent of the Irish World ever since his sudden departure from San Francisco.

— The article which we republish from the Dublin Freemain's Journal, giving a very comprehensive explanation of the Papal rescript, and will cause many Catholics to look upon that document with more complacency than has been demonstrated during the past two weeks.

— According to the Western Watchman, the names first sent to Rome for the Alton Diocese were. Very Rev. P. J. Conway, Rev. Daniel Riordan, and Rev. Father Hickey, the Lazarist. Those on the second list were Very Rev. Father Seannell, now Bishop of Concordia, Rev. James Ryan, the present Bishop of Alton, and Rev. Father McGuire of St. James', Chicago.

— The June number of The Catholic World is one of unusual interest. Rev. M. J. Lavelle's article on "Catholic Young Men's Societies" will attract much attention in view of the coming Convention of the National Union at Cincinnati on June 6 and 7. It gives kindly advice to our young men. A society for them he regards as a garden, not a gold-mine. Hence the measure of success depends partly upon the ability, the energy and the patience of the cultivators. We hope the article will be read aloud and its points discussed in the rooms of every on the land.

— A very recent cablegram from Rome states that Archbishop Walsh left Rome last Saturday night and was given a final audience by the Pope, at which the Archbishop was assured that the Pope had no intention of taking part in political matters, but that decree will have to be obeyed. While the Vatican will not make conformity needlessly difficult, it will not modify the decree in the least or release the Bishops from their obligations. Archbishop Walsh has been directed to publish on his return to Dublin in the Freeman's Journal a letter to rectify the erroneous views which have been expressed respecting the recent Papal Rescript.

— A large proportion of the Methodist preachers are merely political parsons at best, and their political training was well demonstrated last week in their Convention in New York, when a resolution was introduced limiting the term of their so called "Bishops" to eight years. A Methodist "Bishop" generally manages to accumulate a large amount of property and coin during his present life-term service, and as every Methodist preacher has a battering after "the root of all evil," they each want an eight years "pull" at the "horn of plenty" from whence the funds furnished by pious people is poured into the pockets of bogus "Bishops" who have no more right to the title than a blind bat has to call itself a Bird of Paradise.

— Any person familiar with the fanatical spirit of Puritanical New England, will not be astonished to learn that Judge Colt, of the Justice Field of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts effected a greater number of divorces than ever before accomplished in any Court throughout the world. In all he disposed of 341 cases. There was on the docket some twenty-eight cases were continued, and 141 were dismissed for want of prosecution. Of fifty-six contested cases, forty-six were dismissed and ten were set down for further hearing. There were 121 cases where a decree nisi had previously been granted, but in which the final decree absolute had not been taken out. Many of those were dismissed, and the others were placed on file and stricken from the docket, to which they can only be restored by a motion showing special cause for their being again heard. Some of the cases disposed of were very old, the earlier numbers dating back to number 86, which is the oldest number on the docket is 3,825. In view of such transactions as this, Christian people may well shudder for the future of society and its family bonds in America.

Month of the Sacred Heart.

June being the month of the Sacred Heart, we send every subscriber a sample copy of the well-known red leaflet intended to encourage the propagation of that beautiful devotion. Copies of this leaflet, in any quantity desired, will be sent to any Catholic on the Coast who desires to share in the merit of distributing them during the month of June.

The Catholic Church and the Protestant Sects Compared.

The newspaper notoriety given to the Methodist sect in consequence of the assembling of a convention of its ministers and bogus "Bishops" in New York during the past few weeks, has led some of our local contemporaries into the mistake of asserting that the Methodist sect is the most numerous religious denomination in the United States. We presume the papers making this error were misled by the fact that the Methodists make more noise in the religious world than any other Protestant sect, but recent statistics prove that—next to the 6,174,902 Catholics in the United States—the Baptists lead all the other Protestant sects in point of numerical strength.

We know this statement will run counter to the opinions of a great many readers of the MONITOR, who see Methodist churches scattered all over the Pacific coast, while the Baptist brethren are hardly heard of outside the large cities. Nevertheless, our statement is correct, as our authority is the reliable statistical Atlas of the World, published by Messrs. Rand & McNally of Chicago, the returns of which include the census of 1880.

The five principal Protestant sects are represented in that work by the following figures indicating the numerical strength of each: Baptists, 2,132,064 members; Methodist Episcopal, 1,680,779 members; Methodist Episcopal (south), 828,012 members; Lutheran, 654,370 members; Presbyterians 573,377 members The sect calling itself "Christian," or Disciples of Christ, ranks next in membership, then follows the Congregationalists, and after them come the Episcopalians, who return only 323,876 members in the United States.

In this connection it may prove interesting to Monitor readers to learn the relative strength of the Catholic Church in the several States and Territories, as compared with the Baptists, Congregationalists, Presbyterians and Methodists, and many readers will doubtless be astonished to learn that even in the most Puritanical sections of the country, where Catholics were scarcely tolerated a few years ago, the true flock of Christ has now an immense nominal majority.

The foregoing table shows that—according to the census returns of 1870, there were 3,666 Catholic Churches in the United States at that period, ten years later the census returns show 5,600 Catholic Churches—an increase in the ten years elapsing between 1870 and 1880 of 2,014 churches, and from the wonderful growth of the true Faith in this country during the past eight years, we feel well assured that the census returns of 1890 will exhibit a still greater increase in the number of Catholic Churches in the United States than during any similar period since her first foundation in this republic.

It may appear somewhat strange to Monitor readers in foreign countries, that there are States in the northern section of the Union where Catholics are largely in the minority, while the Baptists, Methodists, and other sects have hundreds of thousands of followers. This is easily accounted for, however, when it is known that the slave owners of the South, up to the year 1860, would not permit a Catholic priest to minister among their "chattels." The negro slaves might sing the Jubilee songs of sectarianism, and perform so called religious services which partook more of the hilarity of the circus than the order and decorum of the Church, but such mockeries of religious rites would not suit the priesthood of God's Church, and hence they had to keep north of Mason and Dixon's line.

Since the Civil war, however, the sun of God's truth has been rising above the Southern horizon, and the true Faith is beginning to find its way into the souls of the Colored race of the Southern States. Missionary Fathers and Sisters, who are specially vowed to serve God as missionaries among the Colored people, are gradually winning souls for heaven, and we hope, ere the dawn of the year 1900, that the Catholic Church in the Southern States will show an advance commensurate with its wonderful progress in the North.

Baptist Calumniators of the Church in Council.

Some considerate friend in Washington City has forwarded to the MONITOR a newspaper report of the proceedings of the Baptist Convention recently held in that city, in which we regret to find that the representative Baptists sullied their religious reputations by the rancor they maliciously manifested toward the Catholic Church.

Our Blessed Redeemer designated as one of the marks of His Church, the hatred of the world. Our Catholic ancestors had cause to be proud of the Divine character of their Holy Mother the Church, when they find her so generally hated by fanatics of every religious fully who dwell in all the country that intervenes between Walnut Creek and Washington City.

It is comforting also to Catholics to know that those foolish people who fiaunitently belch forth falsehoods against the true faith, have been branded with direful condemnation by the Son of God when He said that those who hated His disciples hated Him also.

If intelligent non-Catholics would only compare the texts of Scripture which are so plentiful in the bible on this point, with the acrimonious and sectarian attitude of the speckled sects of Protestantism towards the Catholic Church, thousands of them would let the scales of sectarian bigotry fall from their eyes and enter the only Church on earth in which they can secure eternal salvation for their souls.

Calumny, slander, falsehood, and other slang fabrications of fanaticism, are manifest to all mankind whenever the members of sectarian gatherings pretend to concern in the name of Christianity "Popery is placed in the pillory of their passionate hate for public execration: "Romanism" is ranted about and roared at with a noise that would scare a big bull of Bashan into an epileptic fit; "Papists" are pointed out as the Parish dogs of modern days, who are unworthy of even a mangled bone or a kind word. And all this black and ferocious mind of heretical hate and diabolical bigotry is hurled at the conservative, industrious, orderly and religious Catholic body for what crime? Simply because it will not adore the wooden idol which Protestantism has set up in the world!

Let us reverse the picture and ask—with great pride for the Catholic charity of the Church of God—who ever heard of a body of Catholic Bishops meeting in Council for the purpose of backbiting Baptists, maligning Methodists, slandering Seventh Day Adventists, calumniating Calvinists, or holding up Presbyterians to the reeling public as a class whom it was the pious duty of every Christian to most cordially hate?

Herein, therefore, every reflecting, consistent Christian, whether Catholic or non-Catholic, will find one of the greatest differences between the sectarians who have built their religious vagaries upon the sand foundations of Luther, Calvin, Wesley and other inventors of heretical opinions, and the one, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church founded by our Divine Saviour, inspired by the Holy Ghost, and which alone possesses the plenitude of God's wisdom to direct men in the right road to heaven.

Protestant preachers—whether they are Baptists, Glassites, Pastors or Free Chasters, Revivalists, Spiritualists, Adventists or Russites, Calvinists or Inclusaites, Unitarians or Universalists, Eclectics or Disciples, Methodists or Methodists, Unitarians, Swedenborgians or Silly Southcotites.

of bigots who met in Washington, instead of concerning prudently and piously attending to their own sectarian trifles in the grand, merry-go-round hoop them together, they had thoughtfully set to give "Rome" an old-fashioned "roasting," and so they barbecued the big bullock of Baptist bigotry, in order to show their anxiety that the lore they bore their Catholic neighbors!

The first man to make a bonfire of him self at this Baptist barbecue, was Rev. Dr. Hiee, C. Superintendent of Chicago—a descendant, no doubt, of some ignorant Welsh boatmaner among the lobsts of the Earl of Cawdor. This man was terribly afraid that immigration and "Romanism" combined would turn "the great West" of this country into a vast potato patch where no one would be allowed to work whose front name was not "Pat." And, of course, under such a state of affairs, this "great West," which should be reserved in order to raise crops of lollipops for Baptist Lorimers from Llanwellyn, would become a howling wilderness where no Baptist could find anything but holy water wherewith to quench his thirst!

"These hordes of immigrants," and the lamenting Jeremiah whose grandfather came from Pultrihilly, which, of course, other equally unpronounceable place in the land of the Moor where Catholics are largely in the minority, allist the Baptists, Methodists, and other sects have hundreds of thousands of followers. Charges Against St. Vincent's Orphan Asylum.

For several years St. Vincent's Orphan Asylum at San Rafael has been asleep some as anti-Catholic cranks in California who thought that if such an institution did not exist, the Catholic children sheltered therein might become proselytes to Protestantism, while the Sunday School at St. Vincent's drew from the State, if appropriated for the use and benefit of some non-Catholic institution, would partly help towards strengthening sectarianism and neutralizing the Catholic Church in California.

In this way a certain feeling of envy has been harbored in the breasts of that class of citizens who see in St. Vincent's an asylum which stands as a bulwark between helpless Catholic orphans and the anti-Catholic zealots who would sooner see a Catholic child grow up an infidel or a pagan, than to see him contribute to the Christian truths taught by the Catholic Church.

These envious individuals, for their own private ends, and for political effects, have for some time been anxiously endeavoring to discover some means by which they could bring St. Vincent's Asylum into contempt before the people of California, and the unenvious life which occurred there recently has afforded them an opportunity of gratifying their envious and hateful hearts. The great Catholic institution, by permitting them to parade "charges of the most calumnious character" in the city press of Saturday and Sunday last.

The management of St. Vincent's Orphan Asylum has been for years under the supervision of one of the most zealous, kindly, humane and self-sacrificing priests in California. Father Janssens has devoted himself to the second St. Vincent de Paul in his love and care for the orphans committed to his charge, and he has given himself the ardent and courageous Priest of God, when nearly forty years ago he faced death a hundred times in the labyrinth of his missionary duties both in this city and in every other section of this State and the Northern neighbor.

Father Janssens Orphan Asylum is a place of which every good citizen of California is proud. He is known and loved by hundreds of orphans who have left the institution, but it cannot be hope coming from such a source that the Catholic Church would be allowed to do for the orphans of the Church what the Protestant sects have done for theirs. The fresh and fruitful Catholic Church, which is the mother of

Farm and Home.

Family Resemblances.

There are family characters and family intelligences as there are family faces and family figures. Each individual member of the brood has its own variety of this typical character, but in all, its bases is more or less pronounced, though any one particular trait, even the most marked, may be wanting or actually replaced by its exact opposite.

Dull, viewing the family idiosyncrasies as a whole, each member is pretty sure to possess a very considerable number of peculiarities more or less in common with all the remainder. Tom, Jim and Jack may be passionate while Emily is sulky; Dick may be a good-thrift, while Thomas is a miser. But Jim and Dick are both humorous. Emily and Thomas are both musical, Thomas and Dick both sensitive, Emily and Jane both sentimental, and all four of them alike rindicule, alike intelligent, alike satirical, and alike fond of pets and animals.

Look at the persistent Tanyncoine tons in Charles and Alfred Tennyson; look at the parodying power of the two Smiths in "Rejected Addresses;" look at the Caracci, the Rossetts, the Herschel, and then say whether sense minus trouble of taste and sentiment is not some out aloke in brother and sisters. Almost every one who moves brothers or sisters or cousins of his own, after a long separation (when one has not killed his opposite on of the family), must have noticed, with mingled amusement and distraction, in 10,000 little ways and sayings how very closely he and they resemble one another.

Sometimes the very catchwords and phrases they use, their pet sympathies, turn up at every turn of life to be shamefully identical. One may even be made aware of one's own manupeded and unobtrusive failings by observing them, as in a mirror, in the lives of one's relatives, like Doug George's middy in Mr. Gilbert's story, who mists himself on an inshamed island, and considers the double the most disagreeable fellow he ever came across — Popular Science Monthly.

All about Noses.

"Did it ever strike you," said a gentleman well known for having a penchant for the study of physiognomy, to a reporter yesterday, "what a mark of character a nose is to a person's face?

"You have doubtless heard the remark that a woman's nose changed the whole history of the great Roman empire. That woman was Cleopatra, and if her nose had been an inch longer or shorter she never would have beguiled and fascinated Antony, and the events which followed would not have happened.

"Beauty of face depends very largely upon the shape and color of the nose, and scorns or failure, love or hatred, riches or poverty, often depend upon the influence with one's personal appearance at momentous times."

"The nose is strongly indicative of character.

"A flat nose indicates obtuseness of intellect and a disposition toward the indulgence of the animal instincts.

"A nose that is straight and thin, and terminates in a point turned up a little above one mostly goes in prying into the affairs of others, and indicates a meddling, gossipy nature.

"A large nose of the pronounced Roman type indicates much firmness, dignity, strength of will, and judgment. This was the nose of Cesar, Marlborough, Wellington, Buonoparte and Alexander Campbell.

"A nose shaped like the hook of a bird, story of "Oliver Twist" indicates strength and cunning, and a grasping and passionate nature.

"A pug nose shows a person possessed of much self-honor of character, and of medium tastes and abilities, and more given to the gratification of the palate than any other process.

"A nose that is straight, large, not too pointed and with nostrils thin, indicates a person of much intellectual force, and of an honest and generous nature, but passionate and easily angered."

At this point the reporter had to leave and the discussion on other kinds of noses had to be deferred.

The Early Morning Hour.

In the early morning, there is an hour days like paradise than anything else vouchsafed to our mortal senses, as a symbol of the better world to come. This evening is infinitely sweet, but it implies labor and rest, and consolation, which are ideas not entirely disassociated from pain; but in the first glory of the morning, there is no unearthly sweetness, a foretaste of the primitive world, unmoiled, untired, unalloyed; a heavenly life and calm.

The sunshine comes upon us with a surprise, with something of that excitement novelty which it must have had to Adam; the drops of dew shine like little prepotent worlds; the birds, most innocent of all the inhabitants of earth have the self-breathing universe to themselves * * * Awakening and vitality are in the very atmosphere which brings a new hope, a new day, a new world of simplicity and life.

New heavens and a new earth thus present themselves to mortal organ-one, for the most part quite unconscious of them every day. If only we brought nothing with us from the old world that ended in the night! But alas! we bring everything—ourselves, that "heritage of woe," our thoughts, our desires, 'tis no use to escape, for other objects than those which are in harmony with that new life and blessedness.—Mrs Oliphant in the "Wizard's Son."

For Parents.

The advance from one class to another in a school should only be made, when the children are capable of making such by their previous conduct. Nothing would ruin the reputation and usefulness of a school sooner than an abuse of this practice. If then, children are not promoted to higher classes as rapidly as other children are and as parents may desire, the parents should understand and feel satisfied that their children are treated for their good.

As a perfect equality of the powers of the human mind has never existed on this earth, and as the probabilities are that such an event will never happen, parents should never expect that their children should rank first in everything or carry off equal honors with other pupils. Some must be first and some must be last, so the most sensible way for parents to take things is just as they happen to be and not as they cannot be.

Value of Little Things.

Life is made up of little things. He who travels over a continent must go step by step. He who writes a book must do it sentence by sentence, he who learns a new science must master it fact by fact, and principle after principle. What is the big phrase of our life made of? Little sensations; little kindnesses; pleasant words; gentle smiles; a friendly letter; good wishes and good deeds. Life is a million once to a little, may do a heroic action. But the little things that make up our lives come every day and every hour, and if we make the little, create of life beautiful and good, then is the whole life full of beauty and goodness.

Family Fun.

Flakes of Fun.

"Why should we celebrate Washington's birthday any more than mine?" asked a teacher. "Because he never told a lie," shouted a little boy.

Mrs. Jones "I don't trouble to see me to the door, Mrs. Smith."

Mrs. Smith; "No trouble; quite a pleasure, I assure you."

"What's the matter?" "Every time I touch my nose it hurts me." "But you are not obliged to touch your nose." "But how can I tell whether it hurts unless I touch it?"

Father (trying to read the paper)—What was that awful racket in the hall just now?

Mother—Out of the children fell down the stairs.

"Well, you tell those children that if they cannot fall down stairs quietly they want be allowed to fall down them at all.

A five-year old boy was taken to St—recently, and for the first time saw electric lights illuminating the streets. He looked at one of them for some time in silent astonishment, and then ran for his mother and exclaimed: "Mamma come here. Here is a star on top of a pole."

"It cannot be otherwise," he muttered hoarsely; "you must be mine. You and I should not avoid it if we would, and let us thank the stars that our ones will be cemented by love. You could never have been another man's wife. There is a destiny hanging over you—" "Oh, George! she gasped nervously, "brush it away—please do."

A ludicrous mistake happened some time ago at a funeral. Two clergymen officiated, the sermon double the same to that part which read: "You d cased brother or sister," without knowing whether the deceased was a man or a female. He turned to one of the mourners and asked whether it was a brother or sister. The man very recently replied: "No relation at all, sir, only an acquaintance."

The Protestant parish clerk was told to give out the notice. "On Sunday next the service in this church will be held in the afternoon, and on the following Sunday it will be held in the morning, and so on alternately until further notice." What he actually did give out was as follows: "On Sunday next the morning service will be held in the afternoon, and on the following Sunday the afternoon service will be held in the morning and so on to all eternity."

Kansas Judge—You are charged, sir, with voting ninety-five times at yesterday's election.

Culprit—It was patriotism, your honor, pure patriotism. I simply did my full duty as a citizen of a dissenting Kansas town.

"How do you make that out, sir?"

"You know, Judge, we estimate population by multiplying the number of votes by five, and—

"Enough, enough. I fine the county $500 for arresting you."

"What is the percentage of illiteracy in Nebraska?"

"I don't know but that it is rapidly on the increase."

"How is that?"

"Well, the Smith family, for instance. Now 50 per cent of them cannot read or write."

"I don't see how that can be."

"Why, Mrs. Smith had twins last week!"

"Sir, you want to join my company? said the manager of a substantial theatrical company to a young man.

"Yes, sir."

"Ever had any experience?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, I'll test your capabilities. Just pick up that trunk over there and let me see how you would go about letting it out of the window."

If He had Only Known.

A physician who had attended a man during several weeks of illness called one day and presented his bill.

"I don't pay this," said the patient.

"Why! It's correct—"

"I don't doubt that, but I haven's my money. Had to pay a life insurance assessment this morning, and it took every cent I had."

"Ah, your life is insured."

"Yes, and at one time, when I expected to live but a few hours longer, I told my wife to see that you were paid, just as soon as the company paid the amount of insurance."

"My dear man," the doctor suggestively replied, "I wish I had known that. I think I would have got my money."

A Bad Dream.

"What can be more depressing than a terrible dream?

"I will tell you what is more depressing: it is to have a pleasant, delightful dream and to wake up and find it only a dream.

"Have you ever been there?

"Just the other night. I'll never forget the anguish I felt when I woke."

"What did you dream?

"That my mother-in-law paid a month in advance.

When the Best Wants to Pause.

Deacon Treet—"Do you not sometimes have a feeling of inner hesitancy, an awful doubt that will not be shaken off, when your soul wants to pause, and—

Exchange Editor—"Oh, yes; I often feel just that way."

"Ah, you do!"

"Yes, indeed, Brother. It is when I want to slip a good thing from the funny column of a Christian weekly and I can't for the life of me tell from what paper it has been stolen."

No Hurry.

The grave air of patronage and superiority with which little children regard babies is something delicious. A child whose age can be counted in months seems very small to one who has reached the dignity of years. Said a visitor to a certain little girl: "And how is the baby to day, Florence?" "Mamma thinks he is a little better. "Then he is not much better?"

"No, ma'am. He could'n't be very much better you know, because he's such a little bit of a baby."

Useless Neighbors.

Mrs. Gossip—Is that house alongside of you empty yet?

Mrs Gabb—No, a family moved in last week

"How folks?"

"Now! They're the freakiest kind of people, live from hand to mouth, buy things by the cent's worth, I guess."

"Humph!"

"True as I'm sitting here. I've sent in a dozen times to borrow things, and they was out of 'em every time."

PROGRESS OF THE CHURCH IN CALIFORNIA.

Dedication of St. Charles Borromeo's Church Last Sunday.

For the first time in the parish of St. Charles Borromeo, the new bell presented in the church by John A. Lennon, summoned the people to worship last Sunday and not only to worship, but to participate in the solemnity of a new and beautiful temple offered to God under the benign patronage of St. Charles Borromeo. The temple was opened and blessed shortly after 10 o'clock A. M. Very Rev. John J. Prendergast, Vicar General of the Archdiocese, officiated in the absence of His Grace, assisted by Rev. F. Thomas, J. Mahoney, D. O. Crowley, John E. Cuddy and J. F. Mullaney. At the celebration of the Solemn High Mass, Rev. T. McEnaney of Oakland, officiated, assisted by Revs. J. E. Cuddy, Deacon; J. F. McGinty, Sub-Deacon; P. J. Cummins, Master of Ceremonies, Rev. D. O. Crowley, Spiritual Director of the Youths' Choir, was also present on the altar. A powerful sermon was preached by Very Rev. J. J. Prendergast, on the necessity of a practical Christian life, at the conclusion of which the sacrifice of the Mass was continued. The beautiful music after was brilliantly rendered by the choir, and the ceremonies were in every respect solemn and impressive.

The church under the able direction of the pastor, Mrs. E. S. Cody, rendered Von Lee Hanke's Mass Catolica. The singers were: Soprano: Misses Jennie Kewen, Ella Boith, Mollie Murphy, Annie Ryan, Maggie Duggan. Contralto: Misses Mary Cook, Kate McAuliffe, Minnie Harney. Tenors: V. Kiegwald, E. Rauch and J. F. Lennon. Bass: John McAuliffe and T. Parsini. A trio "Veni Creator," was rendered by Miss Mary Cook, contralto; C. Flood, tenor; John McAuliffe, bass; and at the Offertory, Miss Jennie Kewen, soprano, sang "O Mio Fernando." The choir was ably assisted by a large orchestra, which was filled with a large congregation that paid the closest and most reverent attention to the various services and ceremonies.

We cannot conclude our account of the dedication without being heavily tasking the zeal and progress of the parish, and by considering those authors which have contributed to Christian piety in fortunes and prosperity. The parish of St. Charles Borromeo, was informally founded by the Green Archbishop Riordan, in March, 1887. The boundaries at that time were from Thirteenth to Twenty first streets, thence down Twenty first to Valencia, thence down Valencia to Fifteenth, thence to Mission and thence to the City and County of San Pablo. was appointed Rector, and between all about the arduous task of planting the destiny of the parish upon a substantial foundation, which is always and may be truly admirable. On Sunday, March 7th, not Mass was celebrated in the temporary chapel located in Cannon's Hall, corner of Sycamore and Howard streets. The hall was hardly large enough to accommodate the numbers present. From the parish thus formed in the heart of the Catholic residents of the district had been collected in the above enterprise, and on this occasion the few or our beloved Archbishop found their interest in the work of the parish, and contributed the sum of fifty dollars, a contribution of great value to the congregation. Father Cummins next day con menced and actively commenced the work thus inaugurated with the Catholic people and to secure further subscriptions towards the Church Building Fund. His efforts were highly successful. On Sunday, April 21, 1887, a meeting of the parishioners was held for the purpose of taking steps towards a suitable church. Mr. A. B. Maguire was elected President, and J. W. Boyd, Secretary. An Executive Committee was appointed consisting of Messrs. N. Wynne, J. Cooney, D. Mullen, J. Cassidy, J. Cassidy, J. Hassett and M. Fitzgibbon, with Messrs. Maguire and Boyd, ex officio members. The Executive committee also organized at this time with a banner member, a number which has considerably increased since. The present beautiful new church on the corner of Fifteenth and Shotwell streets, was commenced in September, and work on it has been steadily continued since. The architect is Mr. Chas. J. Devlin, who really deserves unqualified commendation for the originality of his plans, and for the careful and able superintendence he exercised in the erection of the building. We give a description of the church. The dimensions of the church are 100 feet in length by 40 feet. The dimensions are 56 feet wide, by 100 feet long. There are two stories and an unfinished basement. The first story is used as a community and parochial residence, the entrance to the latter being on Shotwell street. The remainder of the first story is occupied by the vestibule, a spacious room, and a spacious and extending from the vestibule in front. The second story is occupied by the church proper, 7 feet in width, and by a private staircase in the rear, leading to the choir gallery. At the beginning addition, great results in vestibule and light are secured. The ceiling is 17 feet, with two niches on each side for altars, 6 feet in width. There are two windows, each 11x12 feet. The seating capacity exceeds 500. One the rear of the church is a capacious choir gallery. The building is surmounted with a bell cote, which is built from the outside. The entrance to the church is by a broad flight of steps, which are protected by a porch. Adjacent to the church is the parochial street. Rev. Father Kenney was the builder and deserves credit for the manner in which he carried out the work. The frame-work was generously done free by Mr. and Mrs. Cody. The plastering and painting were made by W. F. Wilson, and the painting was done by Mr. Mullen. The beautiful stained glass windows were put in by Thomas C. Bullard, at a cost of $1,400, and were designed by the following charitable ladies and gentlemen: Mrs. Jas. Phelan, Mrs. Mary Mc. Mrs. Frem, Mr. D. O'Brien, Mrs. J. Meyers, Mrs. M. O. Donnell, Mrs. John Rosborough, Mrs. Duke, Mrs. Jas. Coffman, Mr. Hilton, Mrs. Mr. Phelan, Mrs. Mr. Phelan, Mrs. Mr. Phelan, Mr. M. Phelan, Mrs. Mr. Phelan. The windows were given by the choir and the Sunday school children.

The fair which was opened by Very Rev. J. Gallagher, at the fees of McEvoy and Gallagher, and the fair which was opened by Mr. William Wynne and the ladies Sunday school children, and the fair which was opened by Mr. Mr. Phelan, and the fair which was opened by Mr. Mr. Phelan, and the fair which was opened by Mr. Mr. Phelan

ORACULATION.

Calumniators have | your bitter speech
Has often flung with plaudits Envy's hand,
Malignant darts against our Mother Church—
Shall's manner venture in this world' land.
With venomed darts you long in vain have tried
To cover her with fabricated shame;
Yet still she lives—lives in eternal youth,
With glory fadeless and a spotless name.
Long have you hurled the spears of angry words
Against her plant form—of birth divine;
They lightly fall as when the moon's soft beams,
Upon an antiquated rule shine.
She has lived through the mists of centuries
Gone,
And every century marked with cruel wrong;
With breath immortal will she still live on,
To aid and save frail man through age long;
Man—blinded with your bigotry and hate,
How may ye scorn the chosen one of Him,
Whose glowing face, the blessing sun to chasse upon,
Would trembling shall and sickening grow dim.
What prejudice still clouds the truth stores,
That she indeed is one of mortal birth?
Can ye not see that she is great, divine,
Since rising forth exhort from'ev'ry storm?
Oh! cast aside your prejudice and hate,
And glance upon her with unbiased eye;
Her matchless glory will you then perceive,
Her towering form—her immortality.
Who stemmed the outward march of ignorance
Dark,
Who boldly stopped, with plaions Gothian high,
The Vandal hordes? Who raised weak tallen man
From sin's invitious slavery?
Who broadcast threw the seeds of learning fair,
Of a sanctified while s'er all this earthly sphere?
The world in one united voice affirm—
"The Church—the spotless Mother without fear."

OUR PALLID HEROES.

We gather 'round the graves to day,
Of fallen martyrs long since dead,
And thoughts of sadness fill each soul,
For those who for their country bled.

Our gallant dead gave up their lives,
'Mid smoke of battle, shot and shell;
Their graves throughout the land this day,
Tell they performed their duty well.

For Union and for Liberty,—
They formed late that noble band,
To meet in battle fierce array
The wily foemen of our land.

The rebel heart with vengeance filled,
Set out to take the nation's life—
To rive Union and Union, too,
And thus brought on that dreadful strife.

Those gallant men who wore the blue,
Had vowed the Union they would save;
That our fair land should never be
The dwelling place of any slave.

And battles raged both long and fierce;
The rebel foemen left to yield,
Contented every look of ground
For four long years upon the field.

At last the Union cause was won,
The slave no more a slave was he;
Thy shackled he was—never shorn,
Both old and young bright freedom hailing;
Upon our soldier's graves we lay
Those choicest gifts of mother-earth,
To sweetly hide holiday.

Sleep on, grand army of the dead,
In peaceful slumbers may you rest;
You silent graves—sweet resting ones—
That tell your love of country best.

AVE MARIA.

Softly the bell tolls the vesper hour,
Ave Maria;
Then adieu God lovest; He hath all power,
Ave Maria.
Sweet rose bloom on thy altar white,
Day by dawning year is the night,
Ave Maria.

And when tolls my life meet cross,
Ave Maria;
Then in my car whisper words of peace,
Ave Maria.
Lead me, above, to thy Son's High Throne;
Show Him my child, I am all thy own,
Ave Maria.

TWILIGHT.

There is a calmness in the twilight hour,
When vestal stars beam chastely in the west,
For every troubled mind, and drooped brow
Seemeth to whisper to our spirits; "Rest."

So when hath passed the spirit's high noon-day,
And death's dark twilight gathers in Life's west,
We hear the voice of many angels say
In loving unison that sweet word: "Rest."

Far, far above, where through each star-lined Gate,
The glory of great Heaven falsely glows,
There fix thy Faith; and hope for this, oh, soul,
"An endless life of twilight and repose."

IN THE PRESENCE CHAMBER.

This is the presence chamber of the King!
Attend ye supplicants all,
And raise Him your votive tribute bring,
Responsive to His call.
The moment subject need not dread his frown,
Nor fear His wrath to prove;
For never gentler monarch were a crown,
Or more kind his hands to move.

This is the presence chamber of the King!
How beautiful the place,
Where shone in visible in transports sing
The wonders of His grace!
Around His throne the weaker tapers shine,
Their little bit of light;
Lighting the pilgrim to His earthly shrine,
His garment's hem to kiss.

This is the presence chamber of the King!
Ye faithful souls, draw nigh,
And let your joyful allelujas ring
In praise to God most high.
Have is our fetishism; tribes, spiritual,
Come wise ones from afar,
To greet the Saviour in the house of bread,
Where shines His beacon star.

This is the presence chamber of the King!
He waits our entrance here;
Over the desert sands He bids us bring
The gifts to Him so dear.
A 'ev'ry heart, a soul imbued with prayer,
A spirit mortified,
He will accept, and count as incense rare—
He who for chasens died.

Faith Lost and Faith Found.

BY A. J. QUILLEN.

CHAPTER I.

The bells on the Church of St. Angelo in the city of Mexico rang out the hour of twelve, half of 1867. The late pedestrians, who at their clubs or with their friends had watched the last moments of the old year, hurried homeward amidst the fast falling snow. Within the gloomy walls of a lovely furnished home on one of the side streets, a scene of desolation that poverty would have greeted the eye of the visitor to that home of sorrow. In a miserably furnished apartment, a sad woman, not yet in the prime of life, was lying apparently suffering from malignant fever. The last spark on the hearth had gone out with the year so recently ushered into the past. By the light of a dim lamp which stood upon a small table—the only other furniture in the room—could be seen a child not over ten years of age. In spite of the poor clothing which she wore it required only a glance to notice her beauty. A small silver crucifix of exquisite workmanship hung over the head of the bed. To this crucifix the sick lady pointed as she in a feeble voice, called to her daughter, "Marie, at last I must part with my only remaining treasure. Through the sad moments of the past ten years it has been my only consolation, but see it must go. To-morrow take it to the good Sisters of St. Mary's Convent and ask them to loan you a small sum, and to keep the crucifix until we can return the money. Do not try to sell it, for it was blessed by the Holy Father, Gregory XVI., many years ago, and was the property of your grandmother; at her death it came into my possession, and not a day has passed during the last decade that my lips have not kissed that image of Our Dear Saviour. Come to bed, and try to go to sleep, and to-morrow I will kiss the sacred image for the last time, and send it away that we may secure a little food." The poor child extinguished the light and crept into bed with her sick mother. The wind howled a requiem over the year's tomb, but its sighs were sick as and as the muffled moans of that poor child, who was left by the bury world alone with her mother. The elegant mansions of the wealthy, with their rich hangings and splendid furniture, seemed to mock the desolate home of those poor, unnamed by strangers in the midst of so many thousands. We must leave them for a while and go back to the time when that poor woman stood as a bride within a Protestant church, Ella Blanford was the daughter of a merchant who had once been rich, but whose fortune had been swept away by the civil war, which made thousands rich and tens of thousands poor. Colonel Blanford did not long survive his fortune. At his death his widow and only child were left penniless. Ella, who had been educated at the Georgetown Convent, soon found a position as governess in a wealthy family, which consisted of a widow, a grown son, and several small children. The only annoyance to which she was subjected at the palatial home of Mrs. De Fort was their strong Catholic religion, for Ella and her mother were devout Catholics. At first Ella was inclined to resign her position and return to her mother, but when she remembered that her salary was all that she had to depend upon, she determined through the promptings of filial love to bear her cross in silence and not pay attention to the scoffs which so frequently greeted her ears for the religion which was her only consolation and support. In a short time these sneers began to disappear, as the same relentless tyranny which led to her heart the keenest sorrow.

Another year rolled around. By degrees she had neglected one religious duty after another. She watch Man when occasion or when the weather was pleasant. A boat-ache, the wait of a new dress, or an indescent Sunday, were sufficient to keep her at home. The third year brought a still greater revolution to her mind. Her scruples had been discarded, her Rosary was left within her bureau (ornament), and her prayers had been forgotten. But this was not the only change that had come to the pretty governess. She was the betrothed wife of Louis De Fort, and had promised to be married in a Protestant church. When Mrs. De Fort was informed of her son's engagement she became furious with rage, but finding opposition in vain, she gave a reluctant consent. The marriage was brilliant one, and was followed by a bridal tour to Europe. Shortly after her return she was suddenly summoned to the death bed of her mother, who with her last breath warned her daughter of the danger which menaced her for loss of faith. The old lady, taking the crucifix before mentioned, placed it in the hands of Ella, with the prayer that she should keep it ever in her possession, and repeat each day a decade of the Rosary for Divine help. Ella loved her mother and could not see her go into the tomb without complying with her request. The result was a return to the Church and sincere contrition for her grievous sins. Her husband exhibited great animosity towards her when he discovered that she had returned to her religion. His opposition became more and more violent, until the climax was reached when Ella determined to have her infant baptized by the parish Priest. This he considered a long treaty against Papists and superstitious Romanism by declaring that his child should not be baptized, and told his wife that if she persisted in her determination she must leave his house. Ella realized that God was now testing her faith, which she once so cruelly threw aside.

She resorted to fervent prayer and placed herself unreservedly under the protection of Our Lady of Good Counsel. The position in which she was placed was certainly sad and trying one, but she remembered how willingly and cheerfully the martyrs had gone to the stake for their faith. She would then do her duty and trust to God. Accordingly she had her infant baptized and plead with her husband to cease his persecution, but in vain. She had sinned and God had mercifully punished her for those sins. She was doomed to pass through affliction dark and heavy. Her husband ordered her to leave her home and to take with her the child he said he now despised. It was a sad day when she parted from her for the last time upon Travis Hall and went to the city of M——, to earn a living for herself and babe. For a few weeks she made a scanty support by giving some lessons and by executing fine needle work, but her health failed and her earnings grew less and less. She moved from one garret room to another, until we find her in the dreadfulate abode already described. One article after another had been pawned until a bed and small table were all that were left her, excepting the crucifix, which she had told her daughter to take to the Sisters in order to procure a few dollars to keep them from starving. God had answered her prayers and her faith once lost, but repented, never wavered. She each day thanked God for the rod under which she was smitten, and which she offered in atonement for her weakness in preferring material things to the blessings of God.

CHAPTER II.

A vessel off the coast of Africa had been dismantled by a storm and was being drifted gradually towards the rock bound coast. On board of that vessel were a band of priests going to labor in equatorial Africa, several English merchants and a few passengers among whom was Louis De Fort, who after the cruel treatment received from his family had started for a tour around the world. He had visited all the principal cities of Europe, vainly striving to drive off his melancholy which had oppressed him from the day that Ella was driven from Travis Hall. Finding the gayities of European capitals powerless to drown the voice of conscience, he determined to seek solace in the wilds of the dark continent. For hours the Dauphin drifted hopelessly upon the waters. As night drew her shadows over the sea, the gallant vessel struck upon the rocks, and in more than Francis not some became in an instant food for the monsters of the deep. Those who survived the wreck were made prisoners by a band of natives. They were soon hurried into the interior. Suddenly shaken into the companionship of the one scamarion, Louis at first felt that even their common misfortunes could not cause him to throw aside his hatred for the Church. A change came over him when he saw how calmly they bore their privations during their vexatious march, with nothing but the food of the savage tree to sustain life, with no beds but the hard ground, annoyed as they were by their captors and by millions of insects. Their fate was truly a cruel one. On the third day of their captivity Louis became ill with a low fever and he thought he was concluded to leave him to perish amidst the forest or to become food for the prowling beasts. One of the Fathers, who understood the dialect of the captors, pleaded with them for permission to carry the unfortunate man upon a rude litter. The request was granted, and for seven days the fatigued priests bore him towards the village of Tangasilla. When they arrived at this place the natives formed a profession and with shouts and horrid music bore the prisoners to the hut of the chief, who ordered them to be kept in confinement until the feast of their great idol, Iabandas, when they were to be cruelly tortured and burned. The kind attention of the Fathers made a deep impression upon Louis, who soon recovered. His astonishment at the happiness of these Priests under their terrible surroundings cannot be imagined. Their faith spoke by their actions louder than the words of the most eloquent preacher. As the time of their martyrdom approached, the Priests rejoiced at the glorious blessing heaven had sent upon them, to die for the cause of our Holy Mother. They could not see a fellow man pass into eternity without endeavoring to lead him to make his peace with God. They had come to Africa to labor among the heathens, and they found themselves imprisoned with one as destitute of knowledge of the supernatural as the most benighted native of that land. As yet Louis refused to listen to their few words of instruction. He did not for a moment believe that his fellow captives would go forth to their martyrdom with a smile. A few weeks after their arrival at the village the tribe was excited by a friendly neighboring chief and it was decided to celebrate his coming by sacrificing one of the prisoners. Lots was cast, and it was held that on the morrow he would be led forth to his doom. Each of the three Priests volunteered to take his place, feeling that they would add to the glory of their own death by giving him a few more days to see the danger which menaced his soul. The offer of the Priests was accepted and they drew lots for the prize, for such they regarded the death which was to be the lot of the fortunate one. At an early hour on the succeeding day the village was transformed into a scene of debauchery and rioting no pen could describe. The sacrifice was to take place within sight of the prison. When Louis saw the body march meekly, humbly, thankfully go to his cruel fate, he fell upon his knees in prayer. He arose a convert to that faith which numbers among her most precious jewels the martyrs of those who like Louis De Fort, died for the faith of their fathers. Frequent potations of the juice of a plant, which after fermentation possess alcoholic liberal quantities. A glass of hope came to the ears of Louis and he determined to escape in the darkness of the night. When the intoxicated had his plan to the two remaining Fathers he was a shadow pass over their countenances at the thought that they were to be deprived of the martyr's crown. Yet they were willing to live if God had work for them to do. As soon as the night became favorable from their debauch the prisoners managed, with but little trouble, to escape, and after a terrible journey reached the coast. They at once took passage on a slaver to one of the Dutch settlements. Here the company parted with sincere regret. Louis after embracing the Fathers adieu for Europe, while they started for the mission, for the purpose of teaching that faith which had come to their companions in so striking a manner. Louis at once determined to return to the United States and find his deserted wife. For years he sought her, but all his efforts were fruitless. He advertised extensively, but in vain. He had almost given up all hope of ever being able to make reparation for his crime, when the startling events recorded in our concluding chapter.

CHAPTER III.

It was New Years Day. Louis De Fort, standing in St. Mary's Convent in the city of M——. Whether it was by chance or by the special providence of God that he determined to enter the Convent and have a small sum for the poor to be distributed by the Sisters, we will leave our readers to judge. While waiting for the Sister Superior, a poorly dad child, apparently about ten years of age, entered the parlor and nervously took a seat in the shadow of the bay window. Louis at once left an interest in the little waif, and when he saw the tears falling from her drooping eyes, he approached her and gently asked the cause of her grief. The child at first hesitated to answer, but being encouraged by his kind voice, replied, "My mother, sir, is dying and I have come to seek help from the good Sisters."

"Where do you live, my child?"

"Only a few squares from here."

"Cheer up, I will go with you as soon as I have seen the Sister and see what can be done for your mother; so dry your tears, you may be mistaken in supposing your mother is ill."

A few minutes later Louis entered the room of the sick woman. At the first sight of her pale face he recognized the one who had so cruelly treated and for whom he had searched so long. She was too ill to notice his presence. There was no time for hesitation or delay. He went at once for a physician and nurse, and with the gentleness of a woman watched by the side of that sick bed. As the patient could not be moved, he had new furnitures brought to the room, and in a few hours the scene of desolation gave place to one of comfort. The child was soon made aware of the fact that he was her uncle, her father. In a few days the sick woman grew stronger and the doctor advised her husband to absent himself for at least a short time. With reluctance he went away, but was soon given permission to return. The meeting of husband and wife, under the circumstances, was too sacred for description. The forgiveness asked was willingly granted. Both had suffered and were willing to bury the past. It was not long before the roses came back to the cheeks of Mrs De Fort, and for years with her husband and child she led a happy life in Travis Hall.—Church News.

THE PAPAL RESCRIPT.

It Relates to Mormon Affairs. No Interference with Irish Policies.

DUBLIN, May 30.—At a meeting of the Archbishops held to-day, in Clonliffe College, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted and ordered to be published:

In obedience to the commands of the Holy See, and in willing discharge of the duty thus placed upon us, we desire to put on public record that the Decree of the Holy Office addressed to the Irish Hierarchy was intended to effect the domain of morals alone, and in no way to interfere with politics in this country. Even this very day we have had from our Holy Father, the Pope, direct and unequivocal assurance of his deep and paternal interest in the temporal welfare of our country, and that, so far from intending by this Decree to injure our national movements, it was the hope and purpose of his Holiness to remove those things which he judged might in the long run be obstacles to its advancement and ultimate success.

With these facts thus clearly before us, upon whatever from his other concerns fitting to our filial affection and respect, we must warn our people against the use of any hasty or erroneous language with reference to the Sovereign Pontiff or to any of the Sacred Congregations through which he usually forms his Decrees to the faithful. For, while expressing our deep and lasting gratitude to the leaders of this National movement for the signal services they have rendered to religion and country, we deem it our duty at the same time to remind them and our flocks, as we most emphatically do, that the Roman Pontiff has an inalienable and Divine right to speak with authority on all questions appertaining to faith and morals.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

— The Missing Record of Juneau, Alaska, referring to the fact that Fuller, the murderer of Archbishop Seghers, got a two years sentence instead of being hanged, as he ought to have been, says that "the fact that the Government pursuits or allows its national officers who are paid to look after its interests to appear in court as attorneys and defend violators of law, and thereby use their influence to defeat the ends of justice, affords the Alaska criminal who is fortunate enough to secure the services of such official as any chance of receiving either a light sentence or no sentence at all. Such was the case with the murderer Fuller." This exposure of the way salaried public officials help to cheat justice should be brought to the notice of President Cleveland.

— A new form of outrage has been introduced into Ireland by one of the bullies whom Balfour employs to carry out the Coercion policy of the British Government. A couple of weeks ago Canon Thomas O'Donnell, the venerable parish priest of Doone, in the Archdiocese of Cashel, was engaged on a Saturday afternoon in the confessional when a bailiff walked into the church and, whilst the Canon was hearing a confession, the scoundrel put his hand in side the curtain and handed the Canon a legal process document. As soon as the news of the outrage was known a number of women followed the wretch and pelted him with stones and brickbats, one of which struck him so forcibly as to fracture his skull. The unfortunate fellow died a few days thereafter, and the miserable end of the introducer of this new species of outrage into Ireland is very likely to deter any more of Balfour's bullies from entering a confessional in order to serve summonses on God's servants when they are engaged in the discharge of their religious duties.

— We think every Catholic parent who reads the Mormon fully appreciates the value of Christian education, hence they will be pleased to know that the following tribute was paid to this great factor in making people faithful to God, by Bishop O'Farrell on a recent occasion. "The Church and the school," said the eloquent and zealous Prelate, "comprise the life of a Catholic parish, and in these two words can be found all that is necessary for the progress of the Church and the advancement of her children. Christian education is the true basis of all knowledge, and, so far from being found by our Faith, we alone are the friends of all. . . . All true knowledge is good, and belongs to God. The Church has no fear of any future knowledge. She tells her children to go as far as they can and find God in all His works. . . . This land must remain a Christian land if it wants to remain a free land. In supporting your own schools as well as those established by the State—in paying double—you show you have more love of country than any other people. Without morality there can be no true citizenship. . . . Here in this country, if education is not founded on Christianity the country will cease to be Christian, and with Christianity will depart morality, and with morality, the ties that make men good citizens."

A Sickening Crusade against the Church.

The so-called "investigation" of St. Vincent's Asylum, has developed into a crusade against the Church in California, just as we predicted it would in our last issue. The great strides on the highway of progress which the true Church has been making in this State during the past ten years, have aroused the Sectarian bigotry of certain despicable demagogues who, having some bitter anti-Catholic brethren of the nuptate tie at present in official positions, recently came to the conclusion that if the money allotted to St. Vincent's Orphan Asylum could be stopped by State authority, it would cripple the Catholic Church in California.

The so-called "investigation" was, therefore, inaugurated at the suggestion of a fanatic who has attained unenviable notoriety in consequence of his anti-Catholic calumnies, his hatred of truth, and his entire disregard of any consequences that might arise from his inflammatory appeals to the worst passions of his deluded followers. This fanatical firebrand suggested a few years ago that Catholic edifices should be destroyed by fire, and the boys who set fire to St. Vincent's Asylum were no doubt inspired to perpetrate that murderous act by the teachings of just such scoundrels as the one who manipulated the present "investigation."

So far as the weight of evidence goes, there is not a single charge against St. Vincent's Asylum that has not been boldly met and refuted upon evidence that cannot be contradicted except upon the perjured testimony of reeking Knownothings whose oath to their party will cover any perjury they may commit. The array of testimony we publish in this issue, covers every point of "complaint" made by the black-hearted political moonbeams who are howling at being the cause of the "investigation."

The source from whence the calumnies against St. Vincent's Asylum emanated, the officials engaged to prosecute the Catholic Church because she does not suit their Satanical political views, and the Sanctimonious hoodlums upon whose evidence it is sought to blacken the fair fame of St. Vincent's—should all be known by the public in order to arrive at a general knowledge of the animus of the anti-Catholic crusaders in this attempt at destroying a Catholic asylum in order to cripple the Church in California.

The source from which the calumnies against St. Vincent's originated was a paper edited by an anti-Catholic crank whose name is synonymous with all that is Satanical. A fellow without a consonance of a code of morality. One who has publicly placed upon record his conviction that it is perfectly legitimate to fabricate falsehoods whenever they are necessary to carry conviction in your own favor! The boys whom the chief "investigator" has been interviewing recently in his search for evidence against St. Vincent's Asylum, seem to have been schooled in the teachings of the thorough-bred bigot in question.

That the "investigation" was instituted in order to open a political crusade against the Catholic Church is easily proved not only from the fact that several most notorious Knownothings are engaged in carrying it on, but also upon the evidence of the Sacramento Bee (a paper not by any means friendly to Catholics) which alludes to Mr. Maslin's share in the conspiracy in the following very suggestive language:

"Unfortunately for the good that might come out of the St. Vincent Inquiry it was intrusted to a young man who before he had been in the work publicly proclaimed his verdict against the institution in the papers. The public do not believe that the investigation will be thorough and honest when the investigator, taking his cue apparently from an emphatic article in the reeking atmosphere of Frank Pixley's office, forewarns the world of his decision. Anything so badly managed for their course in the premises. They should succeed in their crusade. Even if the act, on appeal, should be declared invalid, the reform could be accomplished by other means. There is a municipal ordinance in existence that makes the dilapidated condition of houses a vast lesson of ill repute, and also makes it a blackguardly offence for owners of such houses to permit or cause therein The keepers of the houses were, in the opinion of the Court, more than all else reprehensible for the evil which the ordinance was intended to remedy. Until the validity of the statute under discussion can be passed on by the Superior Court, Judge Lawlor recommended that in future proceedings of the nature in question be had under the ordinance.

— Thomas McGee says the following very neat and evidently sincere compliment to the sincerity of Archbishop Alemany, O. P., in the current issue of the Real Estate Circular: "Few better men have ever occupied a prominent place in California than the late Archbishop Alemany, whose death at his old home in Spain was announced last month. Archbishop Alemany was one of the most kindly and unassuming of men. A brother less who erected the buildings built for the Catholic Church for years, once told us that he never had a written contract with the late Archbishop. His word was all he sought, and it was always sufficient. Fussy bumbugs and nobodies by the hundred are continually splashing and pushing in the face of the public, while a man like the late Prelate studiously kept out of the public sight; and, best of all, felt himself to be as small in his own heart as he wished to appear to the public. We do not belong to the late Archbishop's Church, but our tribute to his worth is none the less hearty, and the privilege of regretting his death none the less sincere."

— Rumor has associated the name of Rev. Father Lindemann, of Waterloo, N. Y., a distinguished scholar and well-known as a polemical writer, in connection with one of the Bishoprics in the new Australian Catholic University. Such an appointment would be a vast gain to the teaching force of that University and would be an eminently suitable one.

— His Holiness the Pope has conferred the Cross of the Order of St. Gregory the Great on Mr. Peter Donahoe of this city who occupied a very prominent position in Rome during the recent Jubilee celebration.

— The faculty of Santa Clara College have placed a new bell in their chapel at the College.

The Papal Rescript.

The Letter which the united Bishops of Ireland have addressed to their flocks, settles at once and forever all further controversy regarding the recent Rescript from Rome. The Congregation from whom the Rescript originated intended to deal solely with the moral side of the questions put before them by ecclesiastical dignitaries concerning the Plan of Campaign and Boycotting. The question of politics was never once thought of, and those parting patriots who are afraid that the Pope will make a political platform for the Irish people, had better save their breath and bluster over a more myth.

The Dublin Nation takes a very sensible view of this subject, and as most heartily commends its contribution to our readers as coming from a source that is at once true to Ireland's holy faith and firm in its allegiance to Ireland's cause in her battle for political independence:

"Irishmen have received the Rescript from the Holy Office in a spirit truly admirable. The fact that such a document could have been issued from Rome at a critical moment in our country's history was extremely regrettable, but looked at calmly, the Rescript contained nothing either to excite wild passion or cause deep despondency. And Irishmen have taken the matter calmly. Of their national or individual rights they are resolved not to surrender a particle, and they are equally determined not to do or say anything that would indicate that Irish Catholics have for a moment wavered in their allegiance to the Holy See. It was the action of the Pope's enemies and ours to represent that the Head of the Church had condemned our national objects and organization as illegal; but Irishmen are too well versed by manyremonstrances on gross and obvious, and we are now able to see the result in the calm and dignified manner with which our leaders have so expertly borne the most galling of all injustices—a misrepresentation of the faith of unmerited censure. The falsehoods and the calumnies, the misrepresentations and the strictures of hostile critics we at once discounted at their proper worth, and the warnings that we addressed to our countrymen against the fictions and exaggerations designed to mislead them have not been unheeded.

As a further index of the feelings of the Irish people, we append a cablegram published last Sunday, showing the revolution which has taken place in the opinions even of Nationalists regarding the influence which the Rescript will ultimately have for Ireland's good:

"It is already but barely dawning on the minds of the more fiery members of the Irish party that Pope Leo XIII., in assuming the Papal Tiara, has shown himself a more astute politician and friend of Ireland than any of the Nationalists for the past few weeks were willing to consider. Nothing is more clear for Home Rule than the Rescript will ultimately have for Ireland's good.

"It is already but barely dawning on the minds of the more fiery members of the Irish party that Pope Leo XIII., in assuming the Papal Tiara, has shown himself a more astute politician and friend of Ireland than any of the Nationalists for the past few weeks were willing to consider. Nothing is more clear for Home Rule than the work publicly proclaimed his verdict against the institution in the papers. The public do not believe that the investigation will be thorough and honest when the investigator, taking his cue apparently from an emphatic article in the reeking atmosphere of Frank Pixley's office, forewarns the world of his decision. Anything so badly managed for their course in the premises. They should succeed in their crusade. Even if the act, on appeal, should be declared invalid, the reform could be accomplished by other means. There is a municipal ordinance in existence that makes the dilapidated condition of houses a vast lesson of ill repute, and also makes it a blackguardly offence for owners of such houses to permit or cause therein The keepers of the houses were, in the opinion of the Court, more than all else reprehensible for the evil which the ordinance was intended to remedy. Until the validity of the statute under discussion can be passed on by the Superior Court, Judge Lawlor recommended that in future proceedings of the nature in question be had under the ordinance.

Catholic Reaction in Europe.

Catholics will be cheered by the pleasing intelligence which comes this week from Europe that a great Catholic reaction is now sweeping over that Continent. Speaking of this desirable change in the political complexion of European affairs, an English Catholic paper intimates that the movement which is in France at a long sent up the number of Catholic deputies from eighty to three hundred, and now threatens the very existence of the Government that spent its strength in prescribing the Church, which in Germany made the Centre so strong that the Kulturkampf is at an end; which in Italy has won so many movements for the Pope; which in Spain and in Austria has checkmated all the efforts of the Revolutionary party; which in Belgium has changed the whole force of the national policy, has now been felt in Holland. The long ascendency of the Liberal party is broken at last and the combined forces of the Catholics and Conservatives give them a narrow, but a working majority. The minority has already resigned, and the reluctant King will now be called upon to select the leaders of the Catholic Opposition. The parties in the new Chamber will stand thus: Liberals, forty-two; Catholics, twenty-six; Conservatives, twenty-seven. Some other elections have still to be held, but these results are not likely to affect the balance of power.

Littlejohn's Disgrace.

The London Universe states that a few weeks ago an Irish Protestant Association, after a debate upon Littlejohn's "Plain Reasons" as to whether the book was "a fit and proper work for Protestant and school teachers," decided to strike it off the list. Dr. Littlejohn will soon be able to add to his laurels the Protestant boast of the notorious Billy Hanson. We are told of this bully that he used to walk into Protestant meetings, and, with a cry of "caster" tearing these words, "Lambkin Kicked by Billy Hanson, and Billy Hanson Kicked by all London." In the mind of der Dr. Littlejohn is kicking, or being kicked, nearly all day long; every one and then he kicks "over the traces," and some times somehow all to pieces the vehicle to which he is harnessed. But the world has it out of him, and it is said that, on the whole, he is supposed to get as much of it now, than he gives. But this last affair of the Irish Protestant Association is the "unkindest cut of all," and should send Dr. Littlejohn to a strict re-examination of those whom he has hitherto supposed to be his friends.

A Brave Missionary Priest.

Among the brave band of missionaries who have upheld the Cross and Catholic Faith during the forty years in the Northwest, no name stands forth in greater lustre than that of the venerable Jesuit missionary, Rev. J. Jobin, the pioneer among the Coeur d'Alene Indians, in Kootenay country, Idaho, of whose labors in that country, Idaho, of whose labors in that

The Terrible Growth of Divorces

"The increasing laxity of the marriage tie, says the Philadelphia Standard, "The land of fortnightly in existence, and the red state, the strange confusion caused by the laws of different States, under which a man can legally have wives in different States, and the utter impossibility hereafter of deciding questions of legitimate succession in many cases, are a sufficiently ominous and startling warning. Where the 'Reformers' neglect unanswerable argument they opened the door to all abuses. Marriage became simply a contract. No minister was required by the Puritans to bless the union, according to them God imparted no grace to the Christian union of man and wife. All the sanctity with which Catholicity had surrounded the cradle, the cradle and the home, was scorned. But men became logical, if marriage was simply a contract, they could not see why the contracting parties could not arrange the contract to suit themselves. Divorce was permitted, and we have had its terrible fruits. No amendment of the Constitution, no uniformity of laws can check the laxity of morals which leads to divorces, or can prevent their steady increase. The Catholic body will soon be the only sound moral community in the country, and even amongst helpless the marriage state with any strictness that will be extensive in view of the danger.

The Catholic Home.

In the course of a beautiful and impressive address on the evils of intemperance, which Archbishop Ireland delivered lately in Chicago, he drew this lively picture in words dripping with a humor, tender and true, of the home of many of the humanities and the comforts of the home, where, by the power of the home where the home is supposed to get as much of it now, than he gives. But this last affair of the Irish Protestant Association is the "unkindest cut of all," and should send Dr. Littlejohn to a strict re-examination of those whom he has hitherto supposed to be his friends.

Strong Testimony.

Continuation of the Orphan Asylum investigation.

The testimony offered at the Asylum investigation continues to be overpowering in proof of the integrity of the Institution—witness the following affidavits from well known, and responsible professional gentlemen.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, } ss.
City and County of San Francisco, }

I, [illegible] being duly sworn, say that I am a practising physician and an Homœopathic Physician, residing at 1 Hallam Place, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and that I have been for the last four years in the Orphan Asylum, corner San Bruno Road and Ellsworth Avenue, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and that I have had the opportunity of observing the sanitary condition of the asylum during that period, and that there are from one hundred and fifty to one hundred and two children there in such a state of health and good cheer and plenty of exercise, as I believe, that I have never seen in any institution of the same character in the State of California. The boys were examined as they passed in to dinner on the day of my last visit, and I found them generally healthy and well developed among them. The food was plain, substantial and well cooked. The dormitories were healthy, airy and well ventilated. The sanitary condition of the place is perfect. The grounds are large and healthy, and the children have a good deal of room to play in. The children appeared happy and well contented. I have had the opportunity of observing the children for the last four years, and I have found them

Farm and Home.

Wisdom for Men and Women.

—The end of a thing is the test.

—The greatest friend of truth is time, her greatest enemy is prejudice, and her constant companion is humility.

—Suppose the sunshine of life put the love and authority of God over the soul first and above all other things.

—Nothing is more beautiful than a serene, virtuous, happy old age. Such an age belongs to every individual's life if he only knows how to build it.

—By desiring what is perfectly good, even when we don't quite know what it is, and cannot do what we would, we are part of the divine power against evil.

—Excellence is never granted to man but as the reward of labor. If you have great talents, industry will employ them; if you have but moderate abilities, industry will supply their deficiency. Nothing is denied to well-directed labor; nothing is obtained without it.

—No calling in life but is honorable; no one is ridiculous who acts suitably to his calling and estate; no one, who has good sense and humility, but may be happy stations of life, be truly well-bred and refined; but ostentation, affectation and ambitious efforts are, in every rank, high and low, nothing but vulgarities.

—Lessen not the power of temptation, the force of the passions, the strength of self-love and self-will, the sovereignty of pride and sloth in every one of Adam's children, who will be bold enough to assert of any particular soul that it will be able to maintain itself in obedience, without an abundance, a profusion of grace not to be expected, as bearing no proportion not simply to the claims, for there are none, but to the bare needs of human nature.

—Our thoughts are often worse than we are just as they are often better than we are. And God sees us as we are together, not in separate feelings or actions, as our fellow men see us. We are always doing each other injustice, and thinking better or worse of each other than we deserve, because we only see and hear separate words and actions. We don't see each other's whole nature.

—"One good mother is worth a hundred schoolmasters. In the home she is a leadstone to all hearts and a loadstar to all eyes." A mother is in constant, imitation which Bacon likens to a "globe of precepts." It is instruction, it is teaching without words, often examplifying more than tongue can teach. In the face of her example the best precepts are of little avail. The example is followed, not the precept. Indeed, precept at variance with practice is more than useless, inasmuch as it only serves to teach that most outwardly of vices —hypocrisy.

—The mind is largely dependent for its strength and clearness of vision upon the purity of the life. It is true that a man should know what is right in order to do right; but it is also true that he must be in the habit of doing right in order to make such knowledge of any practical value. For example, one who is accustomed to act wisely and to avoid whatever he believes injurious learns one day through a reliable source that a certain article of diet of which he is fond, or a certain habit that he has acquired, is deleterious, and he at once discontinues it. Another accustomed to self-indulgence, receives the same instruction, and makes no change in his conduct. The intellect of each has been appealed to alike, and their knowledge of the points in question is equal; but in the one case the habit of right-doing makes it operative, but in the other the habit of wrong-doing makes it inoperative.

Recipes for the Household.

STUFFED PORK.

Make deep incisions in the meat; trim it so as to leave the skin longer than the flesh; then parboil some potatoes, mash, season with butter, cayenne pepper and salt; a little minced onion and sage. With this fill the incisions; then draw the skin over and shave it down. Season the outside by rubbing with salt, butter, cayenne pepper and sage. Roast slowly. When done skim off the fat, thicken the gravy with brown grated chicken. Serve with apple sauce.

SPONGE CAKE ROLL.

Take two ounces of sugar, two teacups of sifted flour, two heaping teaspoonfuls of of baking powder; into this break two good sized eggs; beat all together, turn into square jelly tins, and bake in a quick oven on a light brown. When done, turn out on a moistened towel, and spread quickly with jelly; roll carefully out, and wrap each roll in a clean napkin and weave. The eggs are not beaten separately, and the quicker the cake is put together the better it will be.

OLD FASHIONED CHICKEN POT PIE.

Fry and stage a tender chicken, draw it without breaking the entrails, wipe it with a wet towel, cut it in joints as for fricassee; make a good plain pastry, butter the molds of a round-bottomed iron pot, and line the pot with the pastry. Have ready a top crust of the pastry and two or three smaller rounds of it; put the chicken and the smaller rounds of the pastry into the pot in layers, seasoning them plentifully with salt and pepper; last of all add half a cupful of water, and put on the top layer of pastry, cutting the edges to make it adhere to the side crusts; cut two or three small slits in the upper crust; butter the pot-lid, and cover the pot-pie with it; place the pie in a moderate oven, and bake for about three-quarters of an hour, or until the crust stiffens the pie is cooked; then turn the pie out on a large dish, and serve it hot.

How Clothespins are made.

In the factories papers are paid one cent for packing a box of five gross of clothes-pins. An expert can pack 100 boxes in a day of 10 hours. Sharp work, that, handling 72,000 pins a day. Clothespins are made in the lumber regions. They are usually made of a white ash, sometimes of beech, but most of white birch and maple. The wood is taken to the factory in logs and cut into lengths of 12 inches by circular saws. The lengths are then cut into blocks and the blocks into slabs. The slabs are then brought by the operator, the machine pecking them up and slotting them. They are then placed in a revolving pipe drier going thence to the polishing cylinder, and then to the packer. Each pin passes through eight hands. A single patent consists of a board saw, gang splitter, gang chucker, turning lathe, driving house and polisher and costs from $7,000 to $12,000. The machines, however, are very interesting. The little blocks of wood five and a half inches long are placed on an endless belt which feeds the blocks automatically into the lathe. As the lathe is turned the pin is taken automatically from the spindle and placed on a turntable and carried to a circular saw, which splits out the slot in the pin. It is then finished and thrown out of the turntable by the same appliance that puts the pins on the table. Failing, they are caught in a basket or barrel, and are taken to the drying house for ten to twenty-four hours, or until dry. The polishing cylinder or rumbler holds twenty to forty bushels; this is run at slow speed, about 30 turns a minute, and by simple friction and contact they become polished.

Family Fun.

Scene at a Methodist Revival

During a revival at Collins Rock meeting house an old fellow who no one ever before seen in a church, came forward and knelt down at the mourners' bench. He seemed to be so much in earnest that he attracted the attention of the pastor and exhorters. The exhorter held his highest enjoyment in working with a mourner who has crossed the frontier line of life.

"We are glad to see you here," said an exhorter as he got down beside the earnest mourner. "You have come to the right place to seek comfort."

"So I've heard," answered the earnest mourner in lightening accents.

"Do you feel that you have only one way to escape, my dying friend?"

"Yes, an' I took this as the last chance."

"When did you fall under conviction?"

"I won't convicted a tall. They took me up and snatched me bafo' the grymout judge, but sister heario' or the one the jury lowed that maybe I did ot make whisky."

"When did you first feel that you were saved?"

"When I got down in the bottoms an' could n't find my way out. Days did like two days an' the bees pant we another one, but we got the soon all the same, an' had a light that done us all a powto' of good."

"My friend—my deluded friend—may we ask, when did you feel that you were pray?"

"Night afore last wife lowed that it it couldn't do no harm, I must do some good."

"Your wife, then, wants you to lead a better life?"

"Wal it's say nothin' 'bout that. I live the nuer ur life she lives, I reckon. I jui bar a caliver cost ever' spring, a pair an' shoes ever' fall, an' divide my tarbacker with her. Don't see what mo' she could as for, an' don't see why she should want mo to change my life."

"Bet you say that your wife thought it would be better for you to pray?"

"Yes. You see, our starts got away from us two weeks ago, an' as we heard, hosted an exhorter, and thinking better of it, she lowed that maybe pray would help us."

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself!" said the disappointed exhorter.

"Why! ju' bosess! I want them steers! You folks pray for rain, don't you? Why! Cow-yes need it. Wall, I'm prayin' for them steers, bosess I need 'em. Oh! if you d don't want to talk to me, all right, setting placing his head on the bench, he said: "Oh Lord, Thy servant would like powerfu' well to have them steers, for he is a needin' 'em to haul some apples to the mill to-morrow."

How not to Live on $1,000 a year.

His salary was $1,000 a year, and he had just proposed to Miss Clara Lightfoot and been accepted. And they were both exceedingly happy until she said.

"And you don't know how lovely our home will be, George. It shall be a home, indeed, for you, a place of rest and joy and comfort! I'll call the housekeeper up every morning, and—"

"The housekeeper!"

"Yes, dear. Now, don't interrup, You naughty boy. I'll tell the housekeeper to tell the cook to—"

"The cook!"

"Of course; and I do hope we can get a French cook. I love French cooking. And I'll tell the dining-room girl to—"

"The dining room girl!"

"Yes, you. I'd like a brisk, tidy, rosy-cheeked English dining-room girl. I don't care so much about the chambermaid."

"Why, my darling, I'm afraid—"

"Now, now you bad, old boy; you must let your little girl have her own way. I'm sure I can manage the house servants. You can engage the butler, if you like, yes, of course you'll get the cookman; but when it comes to the laundress and scrubwoman and—Why, George, what a dreadfully long face you have! I don't like it!"

It looked longer as he sat in his tea-by. Twelve room an hour later trying to "figure out how the wages of the cook and house keeper and butler, and all the rest of them, are to be paid on $19 23½ per week. He has n't figured it out yet.

Off For the West.

Young Mr. Breezey (from the West)—"I love your daughter, sir, madly, passionately; my father is enormously rich, and his health is poor and getting more so every day. I—"

Boston Father—"Do not speak of money, my young friend; mere wealth could never make my daughter happy. Have you Scottish?"

Mr. Breezy (reflectively)—"Scotties? Seems to me I do. What's his first name?"

Boston Father—"H—m! Have you ever heard of Plato?"

Mr. Breezy—"I had a dog of that name once, but he had got so full of fleas I gave him to a friend."

Boston Father—"H—m! Can you tell Saturn from the milky way?"

Mr. Breezy—"No, sir; I never studied in any."

Boston Father—"H—m! Do you care for Shakespeare?"

Mr. Breezy—"I have never seen hot one of his pipes, Adonis." I liked them, sir."

Boston Father—"H—m! I am afraid, my young friend that I shall have to withhold my consent."

Mr. Breezy—"I'm sorry sir. Do you know which train I had better take for the West?"

Boston Father—"Yes; the first train."

Flakes of Fun.

A little boy was told that the Rev. Mr. Goforth, the missionary to China, would be the only Christian minister in charge of a district having as many people as the whole of Canada. "Why!" he said, "then's he have to preach."

"My life is full of ups and downs," said a elevator boy to the head porter.

"Yes," was the reply, "and my career has been a chook-ered one."

"How late Mr. Tawker stayed!"

"He would have stayed till now if I had not sent him off."

"I hope you did it politely, Peggy."

"Oh, yes. He was complaining of having to be at the bank so early in the morning, and I only looked up at the clock and said in surprise: "Why do you go to business to your dress suit?"

Gallia—"Yes, Miss Smith, I expect to sail for Europe."

Miss Smith (innocently)—"Indeed! what on?"

Gallia (embarrassed)—"Well, er-to tell you the truth, Miss Smith, its on borrowed money."

Mrs. Lumberedge—Pore liddle Patsy's been an awfulnasty a butten, Dotah.

Dr. Rhubarb—Well, there's nothing serious about that.

Mrs. Lumberedge—Ess pain't! S'posin' I tells yo' dat de button was 'sached to one ob ha shoes! Dan wheel yo' say.

(CONCLUDED FROM FIFTH PAGE.)

ST. MARY'S COLLEGE.

The commencement exercises of St. Mary's College occurred last Friday evening at Grand Opera House.

Addresses and galleries of this vast theatre were filled with an audience whose numbers were in the thousands. The following clergymen occupied boxes: Very Rev. J. J. Prendergast, V. G., Very Rev. J. Kadé, Rev. Peter Vincent Chinzon, S. J., P. Dery, A. de Champ, R. Dongé, O. P., A. O'Brien, Jas. Quinn, Jas. Rowe, Jas. Rooney, Jas. Spencer, M. Riley, O. S. A., Jas. Shinnick, P. Ryan, M. McNally, Thomas J. D. Sheridan of Yreka, E. J. Doyle of Oakland and others. There were also present the following members of the Brothers of Christian Schools: Brs. Evodius Gaudere, Lucian, Bertolin, Salvinian, Emilcold, Pionian, William, Blaise, Julian, Wilfrid, Walter, Urban, Ecclesius, Alexander, Leo Lactia, Victorbola, Velosus, Baptist, Virginia, Joseph, Vespilion, Hugh and others. The programme was most agreeable, entertaining and instructive one—was as follows:

Music, "Grand Overture," orchestra; vocal solo, "A Lotus Flower," Lorenzo B. Hanspeak; "Lee XIII," John A. Boyd; double stepping, "The Shamrock," St. Cecilians; essay, "Medieval Universities," Louis P. Oviedo; essay, quartette, "The Dead," choir; essay, "St. Columbkille," John J. Farry; vocal duet, "Ro-mance de la Rose," J. B. Hanspeak and J. A. Conroy; essay, "Ballad Poetry of Ireland," Jas. J. Sullivan; interlude, "Calls of Dagger," choirs; essay, "St. Peter Claver," Peter W. Mulkern; essay, "Transcendentalism," Thomas J. McGinty; essay, "Ora Nobis Nobis Pull," choir and orchestra; essay, "Oliver Cromwell," Michael C. Murphy; interlude, "Jig March," St. Cecilians; essay, "Our Cloistral Day," J. Hanlon; essay, "Christopher Columbus, the Representative of Medieval Universities," Louis P. Oviedo; essay, quartette, "The Dead," choir; essay, "St. Columbkille," John J. Farry; vocal duet, "Ro-mance de la Rose," J. B. Hanspeak and J. A. Conroy; essay, "Ballad Poetry of Ireland," Jas. J. Sullivan; interlude, "Calls of Dagger," choirs; essay, "St. Peter Claver," Peter W. Mulkern; essay, "Transcendentalism," Thomas J. McGinty; essay, "Ora Nobis Nobis Pull," choir and orchestra; essay, "Oliver Cromwell," Michael C. Murphy; interlude, "Jig March," St. Cecilians; essay, "Our Cloistral Day," J. Hanlon; essay, "Christopher Columbus, the Representative of Medieval Universities," Louis P. Oviedo; essay, "California Missions," James H. Hooker; essay, "California Poets," James H. Hanspeak; music, "Amore Consoles," orchestra; essay, "The Ancient Drama," Thomas J. Conroy; essay, "Catholic Emancipation," Peter J. Lynch; essay, "Hypocrisy," Thomas J. Conroy.

The vocal and instrumental pieces were up to the standard of this excellent institution, and the songs were in treatment, less like school-boy productions than the ordinary collegian. The essays were somewhat beyond the mark of boyhood, and showed a good deal of hard work. The delivery was creditable to the young men, and the orchestra was conducted by Very Rev. J. J. Prendergast, V. G.

Poetry.

[FOR THE MONITOR.]

SUNDAY, JUNE 3, 1888.

What raising triumph Sisters in the breast?
Upon the cheeks what shading colors play,
When we have risen from the vale's low crest,
Up the tall Mount—and all the world below?
The world below? yes, buried let it be!
What care we for this prison place of care?
Here we are happy, solitary, free;
Here the fresh sunlight its first brilliance showers.
And who dares chide us if we seek this height,
To hold communion with the gentle stars;
Wouldst blame the prisoner who pauses for light
That sweetly shines beyond his prison bars?

This is a place for reverie and prayer;
God hears us better on this lofty spot,
Where no discordance vitiates the air,
Where hushes, where lives, where follies are forgot.

The soul [illegible] still sins eternally,
By impulse deeply and divinely given,
Act cry, unchastened cry—[illegible] ever sighs:
"Further from Earth—thank God—nearer to Heaven!"

C. ANTHONY DOYLE.

THE SACRED HEART.

It throbbed with an infinite, yearning love,
When shepherds on earth adored,
And the wandering seraphim watched above,
The manger that hid their Lord.

Each pulse of His mystical childhood stirred
With the strength of that love divine;
And a mother imagined such precious word
That wailed from its sacred shrine.

And O, when the labor of love began,
And the tempests of wrath were stilled
By the gentle voice of the God, made man,
By the magical tones that thrilled

The awe-struck throng of the busy street,
The fishermen by the sea;
And the crowd that followed His tireless feet,
By the margin of Galilee.

In the lonely wild, and the noisy mart,
Wherever His journey lay,
How the mighty throbs of that loneliest heart
Held over their enemies sway!

Is the world's watch of that dreary night,
When His hatred as the storm-swept flower,
And earth was dumb at the dismal sight
Of her Maker's anguish-hour;

How that heart with its whelming sorrow heaved,
Till its throes was well nigh rent;
And the pain, yet willing, like resolved
The cup by the Father sent!

And it quivered and glowed with its matchless love
When its life blood drenched the sod;
And the trembling angels watched above
The cross of their suffering God.

The Sacred Heart! how to beneath yet,
With the flame of its love divine,
When the hidden gem of heaven is set
In an humble and earthly shrine!

Where the star-lights unheding glow,
And the altar flowers clean,
Giant stems mortals are bending low.
As rapt in a holy dream.

Where the incense bears on its fragrant breath
The priceless burden of prayer,
And the lamp shines out of one-eyed Faith
Fleeds up through the charmed air;

There the Sacred Heart of the man-God lives,
There broodeth the silent One;
And unto the lofty and lowly gives
Rich store of its boundless love.

Shall we, the children of worldliness stay,
Yet washed in that Heart's pure tide—
Shall we from its tenderness turn away
In coldness, and doubt, and pride?

Shall we—Shall the heaven of earth are thralled
With the wild bird's gleeful tone,
Lovers, and mother, and vale are filled
With the wealth of glowing June.

With praise and prayer the golden hours
Of this bright month we twine;
A chaplet of gratitude's fragrant flowers
To place at Thy holy shrine.

O make our spirits Thy worthy throne,
And let our hearts be
As ever-clear echo of Thine own,
In holiest harmony!

That so, in the heaven of bliss above,
Our spirits may form a part,
Entwined with the flowers of fadeless love,
Of Thine own sweet Sacred Heart.

HOW THE RED GOT INTO THE SUNSET.

A red rose flew up to her sun-king,
And begged him to leave his blue sky,
And sribbed the long-threaded lilies,
Whose cups was the rain's despair.

The sun kept his spite from the lilies,
And smote the rose proudest blossom;
He covered his heart with her petals,
And marbled the young stars as he fled.

JOHN ACTON.

A BRIDE TO HER HUSBAND.

I am leaving home for you, darling,
Leaving love that is perfect, all true,
For a home and a love that are all united—
Small my life be as happy with you.
It is so light thing for a maiden
To give to a stranger her heart;
Ever often be proven all unfaithful,
Though you vow it, "All doubt do as part."

With this ring I thee wed," you have spoken,
"And you with your troth I endow;
Forever through good and through evil,
I promise to love you as now."
Shall it be so? Shall age find you faithful,
Ever true to the pledge you have given?
Or, shall the love-light grow pallid,
That, alas, it one long must be riven?

You think I should trust you? Oh, dearest,
Am I not trusting you with my life,
To come to you freely and gladly,
To stand at the altar your wife?
Did I not have faith in your honor,
Or thought you as true as the sun,
No home would we make with each other,
No journey for life be begun.

Man's love, dear, is not like a woman's,
The a thing quite apart from his life;
While he all, his the very existence,
Of the faithful, the true-hearted wife;
Then love me, tis all that I ask for;
Keep the promise that you have given;
While I, if I fail to my promise,
I hope I may never reach heaven!

The Faithless Steward

A True Incident in Real Life.

It was a dark and bitter winter night. A night in the January of an unusually severe winter. There had been a hard frost for three weeks, and the ground was like iron. Nowhere had the indemency of the season been more painfully felt than in the always bleak country of Northampton. It was about sight o'clock in the evening, the curfew bell had rung out; when a solitary traveler, who had lost his way, drew his bridle and looked round anxiously in search of shelter. The hard, black frost had seemed to grin way about noon, and the sky was overspread with clouds; but a shrill and bitter wind howled over the face of the country; and when those clouds descended, it was not in genial rain, but a heavy fall of snow.

The traveler had purposed to rest that night at the little town of Daventry, but he had been detained at Northampton, and strong began to fall, and the snow with it, soon after he was clear of the little country town.

He had just crossed a wild moor with danger and difficulty, for the snow was not only drifting into the hollows, but covered hard ground to the depth of more than a foot plainly, and it was no slight increase of pain when a sudden sharp wind cut the surface of the pools and streams so common to the country, but which were not, it was probable, frozen so thick that the ice would bear a horse and its rider. Well might the traveler look round anxiously as he dismounted, for to continue his journey was at the risk of his life.

Bordering the moor which he had just crossed, was a strip of woodland. Leafless as they were, the thick branches might afford some shelter, and he might and indeed. Beyond this, there was the chance that some of the larger trees, which were of great magnitude, might furnish a really, or even shelter in its hollow trunk.

It was in vain that the eyes of the traveler, aching and half blinded with the snow, sought through the obliging dark for the cheerful ray of a lamp in some cottage, or that, through the howling blast, he listened with strained ear for the bark of some watch-dog.

There was no resource but to adventure into the wood. This the traveler did on foot, leading his horse by the bridle. The wood was less dense than he supposed, and a double row of beeches, the broad limbs of which, linked together from either side, made a canopy through which the snow had drifted so lightly that our wayfarer discovered there was a beaten track below.

This avenue crossed the wood diagonally, and was so palpably an avenue in the contrivance of which art must have assisted nature, that the benighted man pressed onward with renewed hope, confidently expecting that the stately colonnade of beeches had some human habitation in proximity. In this expectation he was not disappointed.

After proceeding for about a quarter of a mile the path widened, the trees were more sparsely scattered, and presently the way farer emerged upon a wide lawn like space, at the upper end of which, through the twig which the wind made in the veil of snow which hung pendent between earth and sky, he perceived the walls of what seemed a dwelling of some pretension.

The ground was now smooth and level, and over the thick carpet of the snow the traveler had his wearied steed. It was however, surprised as he proceeded that along the broad black front of the edifice that faced him appeared no twinkling ray of light. The building he was approaching seemed scarcely a ruin, but securely there was about it no sign of human habitation. The mystery was explained when the traveler stumbled over a gate which lay on the ground, in the same instant of time he upset tall thistle, which shook the snow from their rank heads as they bent in the force blast. A few feet further and the traveler stumbled over the fallen door, otherwise was caused by a statue which had been thrown from its pedestal. The hurt he knocked off, but the figure of an infant was in the sculptured arms; and the traveler—a devout Catholic—immediately apprehended that the mutilated figure had been that of the Madonna and Child.

A heavy sigh broke from the bosom of the wayfarer as, limp through the white gloss of the snow, he perceived yawning the black arch of a dismantled doorway.

"Ah!" he exclaimed—"I mind me now. Somewhere in this district stood the nunnery of Calesby; so cruelly suppressed the eve ring some three years since. Oh, benedicent Lord, look Thou with a pitying eye on the affliction of the children of Thy Church in this unhappy land!"

As the traveler ceased speaking, and, solemn by leaning on the cropper of his tired steed, looked up at the dismantled doorway, a female shriek, long, loud, and piercing, smote his ear. It was a cry expressive of the extremity of anguish, and was re-echoed in dismal echoes by the dismantled halls of the nunnery and the dark arches of the surrounding woods.

Our traveler, a borgnose of Nottingham, John Osmond by name, involuntarily lifted his breath with a gasp at that horrid cry. A superstitious person might have referred that sound, so unearthly and appalling, to supernatural cause, and supposed that it proceeded from the wailing spirit of some one of the poor nuns, so many of whom had, throughout the country, died of want and trouved by the strictness monarch from their body and happy home.

Such was not the case with John Osmond, as practical a man and steady a tradesman as any member of the corporation before or after his own time. From human life that he well apprehended—that he knew. That it might be a note of warning of danger to himself, as well as of anguish to the unhappy person who uttered it, he also knew.

The destruction of the Convent and monasteries had done much to damage social order. Not only were the members of the various religious communities involved in the most dire distress, but innumerable persons among the trading as well as the agricultural classes, whose industry had been employed by the religious establishments, were deprived of their means of living and made destitute. The result of this was not only an alarming increase in the ranks of the poor, but in the numbers of idle, dissolute men, who banded together for the purpose robbery.

It flashed like lightning, then, on the mind of Osmond that some strayed traveler like himself had been set upon, and was perhaps being murdered in the ruins.

No man traveled unarmed in those days. Osmond drew a short, strong sword he wore—a serviceable weapon, all unlike the slender, gaudy rapier—and ran round through the yawning aperture of the dismantled doorway.

The door opened into a spacious hall, on one side of which a lofty open archway gave ingress to the Convent chapel, or rather to a cloister or penitentiary. Osmond ascertained this by the light of a hand lamp, which stood on a niche, from which probably the statue of the patron of the house of the Convent had been lost. Some living person, then, was about the ruins who must have placed the lamp there.

Osmond sought it up, his first thought of robbers dispelled—more perfect he was now the moment of ruin. The altar over, thrown, the cross drifting through the gap in the roof, the wind howling through the tall casements denuded of the glass, with a fury that well nigh extinguished the poor flicker of the lamp. There was nought living in the ruined chapel save the blind bat, which, dazzled even by the faint ray of the lamp, quitted its roost, and flapped its leathern wings in Osmond's face.

He paused and looked anxiously around him. Surely he had not been the sport of fancy. It was a human shriek he had heard. Hark! it comes again, echoing more distinctly now. He comes within the ruined nave. The sound comes, however, from the opposite direction. He turns back, he goes towards the cloister, and there he sees a tall, slender figure flit along, and out into the driving snow. It is a figure of a woman draped in a noble robe—not the habit of a nun, for that it would be treason to wear. Osmond was a man in the prime of life, strong and swift of foot, and he pursued the figure.

As she passed from under the open arch of the cloister into what had once been the Convent garden, she turned her head. Then, by the pale ray of the lamp which he held Osmond beheld a sun, sweet face, very white and wasted, and lighted by a pair of wild, dark eyes. The face of a young creature, who could scarce have passed her twenty-second year, but, in strange contrast to its youth and beauty, the hair that surrounded and swept down to the shoulders was as white as the descending snow.

In vain Osmond called upon the girl to stop, assuring her that he himself was a shamed and benighted traveler; with renewed shrieks she fled before him and disappeared. The dismal cries, however, ceased suddenly, as Osmond, at no great distance, Shading the lamp with his hand from the wind, which threatened to extinguish it, he moved was slowly making the way through the snow in the direction in which, by her footprints, he could tell that the woman had fled.

He had not, however, taken twenty steps, when a redder and stronger light than that which he carried flashed athwart the gloom. Then he heard an exclamation about his knee, which he had left tethered to the shaft of a broken column in the porch. The voice was a man's, and, from the tone of the parent, that of these was apparently advanced in life, the other a well built, good humored looking young fellow, about five and twenty, was probably, from the resemblance between them, the son of the elder man. Both were attired after the fashion of the better sort of peasants, or small farmers, of those days.

They advanced rapidly when they saw Osmond with the lamp in his hand. Their anxious brows smoothed when they accosted him, for his staid, respectable appearance reassured them, for, even as he had done, they feared that some lawless had chosen the ruined Convent as the scene of his exploits.

"Have you, fair sir" said the elder of those men to Osmond, "You have doubtless brought in this sacred place a shelter from the snowstorm. Oh, tell us quickly, have you seen aught of a young girl, fair and beautiful, but with hair, alas, whiter than mine own?"

"I have seen such a person," answered Osmond. "Her tones of distress drew me into this sacred pile. I would have offered her aid, but she fled before me like one demented."

"Ah!" she is demented" said the old man. "Good sir, canst thou tell which way she fled?"

"Yonder, as I think," said Osmond, indicating with his hand the direction in which the girl had fled.

"Alas, alas" exclaimed the old man, with a sigh. "Thou art sadly out of thy road, the cold this bitter winter. This is the third night within the week that she has escaped us."

"Who is this unhappy young person, and what brings her to this ruined place?" inquired Osmond.

The old man looked at him disturbedly. "Do you known, good sir," he said, "that this was not long since a nunnery, which His Grace the King thought fit to suppress?"

"A gracious act," replied Osmond, gravely. "Old man, if thou was a friend to any of the poor nuns of this house, fear not to say so; were my power but equal to my will, thy word full soon be remunerated in their deserved bulk."

"Oh, good sir!" returned the old man, "many, I ween, are of your mind; but those who have the skill to repair those cruel wrongs are not in authority. Oh, Lord! minds in these evil times one scarce dare speak freely to one's own brother, and I am but a poor and simple man. There seems a curse upon us, that we may speak and look but of those speak for you beyond your doing, I must even bear the penalty. The king can have of me only my poor life, though he wore told ten times over that I have done the best out of my little means to maintain the crazed nun of Calesby, whom the wrath of the Prince, Alicia de Lacy, the fairest rod richest damsel in the whole shire of Northampton."

The old man still purdled his way across the waste ground that surrounded the ruins, followed by his son and the friend.

The snow storm had greatly increased, accompanied with a force gale of wind that whirled the frozen particles like splinters of ice into the faces of the party and well nigh extinguished the torch. The locality, however, was perfectly well known to the old peasant, and he presently led the way to a visible gate set in the wall of what had been the cemetery of the Convent, the melancholy place even when the quiet received from the world's strife, the Convent was the abode of the living, more dismal now when the darkness of desolation were upon the ashes of the dead. Yet, in the cemetery, as in the ruins, there was a sign of obtaining it after all, with bitter reproal the poor Prioress into the bargain.

The thunder-cloud burst at the moment of the Dissolution overwhelmed all the religious houses in the country.

The villainous Notary then wrought out his evil designs so successfully that he made abortive the mercy of the very commissioners themselves, who strongly recommended the king to spare the Convent of Calesby.

Equally faithless he manage to render abortive the efforts of the Prioress of Alicia, to whom she offered the sum of a thousand marks if she would reveal and let Henry to spare her Convent.

All the poor Prioress and her nuns were driven from their Convents, he took part in the process, and inadvertently marked that she would, in spite of her folly and well wish, he would settle on her a portion of the property which he was to be for fall into his hands.

This proposal the young nun, of course, rejected with horror.

"Go starve, then, go starve" said the hoary ruffian.

Within the poor Sisterhood literally did. The Prioress died before the year was out; the rest of the community wandered away, some sought out their friends, and where; and Alicia would have shared the fate of the Sisterhood of Calesby, but for of William Barton, an old servant of her father, and now the owner of a few acres of ground, which he cultivated with the help of his son.

On losing her friend the Prioress, Alicia was attacked with a brain fever, which, for a long time, left her in a state of such harmless but absolute insanity.

In this condition the sole consolation of the unhappy girl was in wandering about the ruins of her beloved Convent.

Her friends, the good Barton and his wife, did not oppose this fancy to her wandering, but they were uneasy for the approach of the winter.

Watch her as vigilantly as they could, however, she would escape them, as she had done on this night of her death, which was caused, no doubt, by her waderings in the inclement weather.

Such was the shock and story of Alicia de Lacy, told to the worthy burgess, John Barton, by an aged silly hatted Priest, who had been confessor to the Convent.

Osmond had accepted the proffered hospitality of the good Barton, and accompanied the old man on home with their mournful burden of the dead Nun.

Osmond was a well to do, as well as worthy man, and as his cost Alicia was laid beside her friend the Prioress, in a fashion befitting her condition as a baronial heiress, not that of an outcast Nun.

Osmond remained in the neighborhood to attend the funeral, as a mourner, along with the good Bartons.

It was the second day after Alicia's death. Osmond was walking in the garden of the house, when the sun, the sky an intense blue, the air, the long, yellow pendant on the Convent ruins alone with the varied tints of the opal, the hoar frost on the dead yews glittered as though the dark boughs of the yews had been thickly sprinkled with diamonds.

Some of the better class of the inhabitants of Calesby, hearing of the heroic conduct of the stranger, Osmond, joined the funeral train.

Few among the poorer class were absent. Scarcely any the poor but grieved for the ruin of the religious houses.

The procession was nearing the Convent cemetery when, coming along the river road, which was slippery as glass, came a horseman, who, on observing the cortege, suddenly upon the funeral train, and his horse was startled.

The coffin was directly before the forty armed. Inverted, round, and thrown upon rider, whose skull was fractured by a large flint stone.

The coffin of Alicia de Lacy was carried directly over the spot from which the man was lifted, and, on the spot, and that man was the Notary, Irion Oberring.

— Mrs. Margaret Marshall, of Nelsonville, Ohio, who came of a good Irish family, has just died at the age of 105 years. She was the youngest of seven children, most of whom were remarkable for long life, one living to be over 100 years, and the other to be over 90 years, and the youngest was two feet four inches tall and weighed nearly 200 pounds.

— A young man used to call on a young lady in Madison, Ind., several nights ago. She called his attention to the fact that he was late, inquiring that she was the "Queen of Morphens" when he came. The young man added to the amusement of the situation by innocently remarking that he thought he heard that Eliza gossed about because in.

— Speaking of Shakespeare's use of words, the Philadelphia Sunday Chronicle says: "In the sense of 'dizzy' among those shelly-coat and the wool is still current among card players—when the player who trumps a trick or throws away upon it' when he has not, is inadvertently said to be 'shelled' or 'wool-gathered.'"

— The fall for the establishment of municipal villages in Spain, which has been agreed to in principle, provides that the age of the electoral power by all male Spaniards above the age of twenty five, except convicts, paupers and soldiers. The clergy will have the right of voting but will not be eligible for Congress.

— M. Paul Leroy-Beaulieu gives figures showing the quantity of cereals consumed in the different countries in Europe. The rate per 100 inhabitants, according to him, is as follows: Spain, 116 pounds; Italy, 120 pounds; Great Britain, 138 pounds; Russia, 192 pounds; Denmark, 224 pounds; Norway, 225 pounds; Austria, 273 pounds.

CATHOLIC SCHOOL EXHIBITIONS.

SANTA CLARA COLLEGE.

The thirty-seventh annual commencement exercises of Santa Clara College took place on the 4th and 5th inst., and were attended by large numbers of the parents and friends of the students from different sections of the State. The proceedings opened with a Sunday, which the Jesuit Fathers generously provided for to friends of pupils and a large number of invited guests, all of whom thoroughly enjoyed the festivities, as well as the many happy reunions of old time fellow-classmates and old time friends, which took place among those who celebrated in bygone years.

Among the many prominent citizens present at the banquet, the Monitor representative saw and did the following:

Hon. Judge Brown, Hollister; Hon. Judge L. Archer, Hon. James H. Campbell, San Jose; Hon. Thomas T. Wilson, Dr. W. W. Blackburn, L. Accosta, Ed McLoughlin, John Ely Jr., H. E. Wilson, Peter Dunne, N. Yorke, Ed. Vosmer, Dal. Younger, San Jose; H. Mulhare, Seattle; A. C. Fowler, Evergreen; J. EDITORIAL NOTES.

—Right Rev. Bishop Gilmour, has ordered that no priest shall officiate at funerals where flowers are used. He states, he takes this course to put a stop to the excessive worldliness their abuse causes.

—The Vatican Exhibition closed on the 31st ult. It was visited by 500,000 persons. The works of art will be kept by the Holy See. The chalices, vestments, etc., will be given by the Holy Father to poor churches and missionary priests.

—The bill for the State inspection of the parochial schools in Massachusetts was defeated by the Legislature of that commonwealth. The good sense of the best citizens of New England revolted against this new form of religious persecution.

—The mis-called "American" party has lost its barrel-organ! In other words, the American is dead and buried, just as it ought to have been one week after it was born. It is to the credit of California that not enough Knownothings could be found inside the Golden Gate to keep the American from starvation. People are beginning to discover that Knownothing cranks are about the meanest element in every community.

—Rev. Dr. Daniel O. Savage, pastor of the Orchard Primitive Methodist Church at Green Point, resigned because the young men of this congregation refused to give up ball-playing. He was defeated in a vote to increase his salary, and so he was put out on the first base! In the mean time the ball-tossers are getting along without Methodism, and, strange to say, the local paper says that their ball-playing has wonderfully improved since the savage minister resigned!

—A putrid Protestant preacher recently wrote a filthy work attempting to show why priests should wed, but there is not the slightest necessity for writing a volume showing why Protestant preachers should wed, as there are at present forty-seven of them in different portions of the country who are seeking divorces or defending themselves against certain charges brought against them by their disgraced wives! Oh! no preachers require no rules to regulate their Mormonizing proclivities!

—Mr. W. J. Onahan, Chicago's City Collector, has been removed from his position by Mayor Roche, at the suggestion of a political ring which is controlled by the liquor dealers of Chicago. Mr Onahan was endeavoring to regulate the liquor traffic in Chicago, and he was made a victim of the vengeance of schemers who care not how many men, women and children are sent to drunkard's graves so long as the right "ring" rules and their friends are fed at the public crib.

—The Labor Unions of the East seem to be keeping themselves busy expelling Henry George from fellowship with them. How the great George has fallen! Only a couple of years ago he was a bright star in the political constellation, and now he is only a useless meteorite! In the meantime his implacable enemies have taken to politics as naturally as a duck takes to water. He proposes to smash the New York democracy, but the smashed man is far more likely to be badly smashed himself before the session of '88 is over.

—A recent cablegram from Dublin announces the death in the British garrison of that city, of Colonel King-Harmon, Assistant Under-Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant. The deceased was associated with Inspector Mallon in the latter's efforts to ameliorate the condition of the tenant-farmers in Ireland, but he proved himself a traitor to his first political convictions, turned place-hunter and was paid his price for his perfidy to his principles by securing a snug berth under the British government. Ireland can well spare such traitors.

—It is a gratifying fact to place on record that Devotion to the Sacred Heart is spreading in every direction throughout the whole civilized world. This is the second centenary of the Revelation of Our Divine Saviour to the Venerable Margaret Mary, and that fact alone should give additional zeal to those who promote this beautiful devotion by spreading it among their co-religionists. We will most cheerfully continue to send the little red leaflet of the Sacred Heart in any quantity named, by mail or express, to all who desire them for the purpose of propagating this beautiful and salutary devotion—free of all cost.

—Baptism is a mere mockery among Baptists, if we may judge by the following circumstance as related by the Harrodsburg Herald: "Two brothers, not living more than fifty miles from Harrodsburg, looked so much alike that when one of them joined the Baptist church and was about to be immersed he found that he had no clothes suitable for the occasion, as he expressed it, and paid his brother ten cents to be baptized in his place, which was done. This story seems incredible, but it is nevertheless the fact, and would never been found out had not one of the brothers got angry and gave it away."

—Canon Kennard, who has been for several years in charge of the West of England Industrial School—an institution somewhat like St. Vincent's Asylum at San Rafael, was in the city last week, and in alluding to the reported complaints of some of the boys in the latter institution, the Canon said: "It is an exceedingly difficult matter to get the truth from the class of boys who attended such schools. They were chiefly Arabs and street waifs, whose associations in the majority of instances had thrown them with people who had no particular regard for veracity and honor. Such boys always wanted to lie free, and resented any disposition to control or restrain them or induce them to behave properly."]

Disgraceful Desecration of Decoration Day.

In last week's MONITOR a correspondent briefly alluded to some anti-Catholic calumnies introduced into an Address delivered on Decoration Day at Oakland, by Rev. G. W. Sweeney, D. D., who is one of the literary and theological luminaries of the sect known as the Campbellites. The Rev. G. W. Sweeney assumes to his name the suggestive letters D. D., which usually stand for Doctor of Divinity, but in the present instance the gentleman is entitled to have four "Ds" after his name, thus: Disgraceful Desecrator of Decoration Day.

Inasmuch as Dr. Sweeney had the foolish temerity to hold up both the Catholic Church and American citizens of Christ's true faith to public contempt and ridicule on an occasion when he should have avoided introducing any intemperate language or any intolerant ideas concerning any man's religious belief, we feel that his remarks upon that occasion deserve critical analysis so that Catholics may fully understand the intellectual calibre of those malignant-minded men who never miss an opportunity (no matter how inopportune) to spitefully hurl their hatred at the Holy Father and to calumniate Catholic citizens. For this reason, therefore, we propose to copy from the Oakland Tribune's report of Dr. Sweeney's Address many precious literary morceaux so that MONITOR readers may gain wisdom from the fall of this grotesque gapeloing Gamaliel.

The first weighty words of wisdom which fell from the fruitful tree of knowledge which Dr. Sweeney cultivates in his mental orchard, were these:

"The human memory is a tablet, on which it was doubtless the intention of the Creator to inscribe deeds human and divine. It is neither first, sinus or inner, and yet on it may be written science and philosophy and poetry, and the deeds of our world and the experiences of eternity."

No doubt Dr. Sweeney dug deep into the soil of his erudition in order to bring to the surface those literary gems of his creative intellect, and yet Dr. Sweeney will no doubt be astonished to learn that no school-boy in the lowest grade of any Catholic parochial school would be guilty of such pallable paradoxes, ridiculous comparisons, incorrect similes and false figures of speech. The idea that the "experiences of eternity" can be written on "human memory" is palpably absurd; but this only wonder is the school-boys who attended Dr. Sweeney's discourse did not ask him to analyze this nonsensical paragraph.

The next absurdity in Dr. Sweeney's address occurred when he said: "Sacrifice is a tablet on which is written the fall of man." Sacrifice is a voluntary act, the fall of man was a compulsory punishment, and there is no more affinity between the two acts than if Dr. Sweeney had said that Lake Merritt was Mount Shasta! Dr Sweeney also blundered very badly—especially for a Doctor of Divinity—when he said: "No man ever spoke a language that he had not heard." If Dr. Sweeney will cast his Divinity eye over the nineteenth and twentieth verses of the second chapter of the Book of Genesis, he will read therein that Adam, the first man, originated the science of "all the beasts of the earth and all the fowls of the air" and that this Adam spoke enough words to make up a vocabulary of Natural History, not one of which he had ever heard!

Again, if this remarkably shallow biblical scholar will open the bible at the second chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, he will learn that after the Descent of the Holy Ghost, the Apostles "began to speak with divers tongues," and in languages which many among them had never heard in their lives!

And again, did Dr. Sweeney during his evidently profitless biblical reading, ever come across the biblical account of the confusion of tongues at the building of the Tower of Babel? The record thereof in Genesis says that the Lord caused such a confusion of tongues that the builders of Babel, who previously all spoke one language, were surprised to hear nothing from their kindred were confused and discorded words which no one understood, the result of the confusion being that the building was abandoned, and so the place was called Babel, which signifies confusion.

If not some Dr. Sweeney knows that Catholics are not permitted to read the bible, hence he is the more informed as having his wonderful biblical knowledge exposed by a Catholic layman to whom the bible is sealed book!

Passing over a dozen other similar mistakes in Dr. Sweeney's oration, we come now to the part where the preacher of religious prescription "let himself loose" in order to manifest the bitter blackness of his bigotry. Here is Dr. Sweeney's first blast from his Knownothing bugle:

"A tremendous energy of free life goes forth from the American school, which is obtaining and claimed by the President, pope or devil who dares to stay it."

The individual who used such insulting and disgusting language on Decoration Day is a preacher of Christianity and a Doctor of Divinity! The kind of Christianity which can find a lodgement in the bosom of such a bigot, every intelligent man may reasonably imagine, and the raging passions of hate which must have suggested such splendiferous sentiments—is sufficient evidence that there is far more Infernity than Divinity in the Doctor's distinctive title!

If the "free life," which is supposed to go forth from American homes, schools and churches," is of the same character as that which gave voice to Dr. Sweeney's rancorous venom, it only serves to show that Protestantism is not the Christianity which the Son of God preached, nor does the sectarians of Dr. Sweeney partake even in the smallest degree of that Divine "peace and good will to all men" which our Blessed Lord and should be the watchword of His true followers. Should Dr. Sweeney? Thus to flaunt your diabolical hate in the faces of your fellow-man on such an occasion, and also to show your own ignorance of the spirit of Christianity by adding adjectives to your vituperation by calling upon the Author of Peace and Charity to assist you in your work of slander, and to bless your bigotry, is engendered, bad English is stilted, bad example is given, and blasphemy by the bushel, all with insults by the score—are hurled at the heads of Catholic citizens whose tears have long continued to fall over the graves of those relatives who died with their face to the foe!

Dr. Sweeney's bigotry reached its climax when he said:

"And now I ask in this assembly, whether I have no right to be proud of the land of the free and the home of the brave, and of the fact that I am a citizen of the United States, and of the fact that I am a member of the Protestant Church, and of the fact that I am a member of the Protestant Church, and of the fact that I am a member of the Protestant Church

Farm and Home.

Household Wisdom.

—Keep large pieces of charcoal in damp corners and in dark places.

—If raccoons is spilled upon the clothing, hang the article soiled in the air and the spot end smell will soon disappear.

—Lavender water used to remove tea and coffee stains, grass and fruit stains from linen, is made as follows: Mix well in an earthen vessel one pound of setsde, five ounces spirit of alcohol and one quarts of soda water.

—A nice accessory to a closet without drawers suitable for laying in a new dress, is to make one or more bags to cover over a dress, and thus protect it from dust. These bags are made longer than the dress skirt, and are hung up by loops.

—Put under the damask cloth upon the table a soft cover of thick Canton flannel, if you cannot afford the heavier table felt sold for this purpose; or an old blanket, darned, washed and kept for this use only, will prove satisfactory. The upper cover will lie more smoothly, look like a much better quality of napery and keep clean a third longer than when spread over the bare table top.

—A porcelain-lined kettle is the best kind of vessel for preserving, and this is so popular now, that it is ready to lease of copper kettle that is used, but as there are some who cling to the old-fashioned vessel, they should be very careful and see that it is scoured as clean as possible before using.

—An elastic mucilage: To twenty parts of alcohol add one part of salicylic acid, three parts of soft soap and three parts of glycerine. Shake well, and then add a mucilage made of ninety-three parts of gum-arabic, and 180 parts of water. This is said to keep well, and to be thoroughly elastic.

—The quickest way to crach ice: Put a lump of ice on a clean, folded towel; take a pin and cover its head with a fold of the towel to prevent the pin from slipping; then with the pin held in your hand; you will find that you can drive the pin instantly through the thickest part of the ice, chipping it as you require, and as fast as you can, not more your hand from one piece to the other.

Nine Remedies in Nine Sentences.

For a sore throat cut slices of fat, boneless bacon, pepper thickly, and tie around the throat with a flannel cloth. If strung by a bee or wasp, make a paste of common earth and water, apply at once and cover with a cloth. For a cold on the chest, a flannel cloth wrung out in boiling water and sprinkled with turpentine, laid on the chest, gives the greatest relief. When a fever first begins to make its appearance, take a lemon, cut off one end, put into it as much of the longest it is kept there the better. For a cough, one ounce of flaxseed in a pint of water, strain and add a little honey, one ounce of rock candy and the juice of three lemons; mix and boil well, drink as hot as possible. Often after cooking a meal a person will feel tired and have no appetite; for this heat a raw egg until light, stir in a little milk and sugar and season with a pinch of salt, and drink an hour before eating. For burns or scalds, make a paste of common baking soda and water, apply at once and cover with a linen cloth. When the skin is broken apply the white of an egg with a feather; this gives instant relief as it keeps the air from the flesh. At the first sign of a run round, take a cup of wood ashes, put in a pan with a quart of cold water, put the pan on a stove, put your finger in the pan, keep it there until the water begins to boil, or as long as it can be borne; repeat once or twice if necessary.

To Preserve the Beauty of Flowers.

For keeping flowers in water, finely powdered charcoal, in which the stalks can be stuck at the bottom of the vase, preserve them surprisingly, and renders the water free from any obnoxious qualities. When cut flowers have faded, either by being worn a whole evening in one's dress, or as a bouquet, by cutting half an inch from the end of the stem in the morning and putting the freshly trimmed end instantly into quite boiling water, the petals may be seen to become smooth and so renew their beauty almost in a few minutes. Colored flowers—scarlet geranium, azalea, rosebud geranium, may be treated the same way. But white flowers turn yellow. The heavy textured flowers amend the most, although easily overdone scarcely. We have seen flowers that have lain the whole night on a table, after having been worn for hours, and which at breakfast next morning were perfectly restorated by means of a capful of hot water.

A Common Story.

"How did you manage to get so much in debt, Sam?" "The story is a simple one. I'm avid here I gave my note for $60 at 12 per cent payable after two months, and I got only $40. At the end of two months I found myself unable to pay the note. To borrow the money I had to give a mortgage on $750 worth of live stock, my working team. I knew that if the note were not paid, and I present should be sold, that I should get nothing from the proceeds, as it would require all of it to settle the note and my expenses of the foreclosure. So I was obliged to borrow again and a larger amount, and mortgage more stock. The same note fell due, again I could not pay. This thing has gone on for two years now, and from owing at first $60 I now owe $200. And every thing I have that moves on foot is mortgaged to my mortgage. I can borrow no more for lack of security, and must be sold out."

Poultry is King.

At a discussion of the Bedford (N. Y.) Farmers' club, Rev. J. C. Hoyt declared that on the farm to-day poultry is king—not colton or corn, as it used to be. Take the official report of 1883 as an example. The wheat product of that year was worth $488,000,000; the cotton product $410,000,000; the dairy product $254,000,000. But the poultry product was worth $600,000,000, nearly half again as large as the cotton product, and larger than both the iron and steel products together. Stuff it is not half as large as it ought to be. In the year named we imported 27,627,000 dozen of eggs, worth $7,627,000. This from Germany nothing as over 2,000,000 dozen and China over 1,000,000.

Origin of the Sandwich.

Of the millions of travelers who have partaken of the tedious sandwich as they journeyed through life and dined at the gregarious lunch counter, few probably know where this bunger annihilating vized got its name or even its first from the islands in the Pacific Ocean, as some suppose. Nor from the word "wich" is found in some of them. The sandwich is the invention of Lord Sandwich, an English aristocrat who was such an inveterate gambler that he would not leave the gaming table, and had slices of meat placed between slices of bread, which he devoured between the progress of the game.

Medicine Raisins.

The medicine raisin is produced by simply arresting one of the processes of nature. When the grape is about one-half ripe the end of the vine is bent down and buried in the ground. This prevents the formation of seed and the full development of the fruit, but it ripens all the same, and has a delicious flavor.

Family Fun.

Suggestive Smiles.

"I swear by those tall elms in yonder park—" he commenced, but she interrupted him.

"Swear not by them!" she said imperiously. "Why not?"

"Because those trees are slippery elms," she said simply.

—Stingy Husband—Does charging all day, you say?

Sharper Wife—Exercises breakfast.

"Why I had a bit but 50 cents to give you this morning."

"That was plenty. I never pay more than that for lunch."

A local paper says that Boston has a grocer so mean that he has been seen to catch flies and hold them up by their hind legs and look in the cracks of their feet to see if they have been stealing any of his sugar.

Bobby—Say do you like my sister Belle? Young Mr. Jones—Why, certainly, little girl. Everybody likes Miss Belle, do they not?

"Dunno. I guess she likes you too. She told ma you was a perfect—perfect—I most forget what."

"But try to think, Robert. Was it a perfect gentleman?"

"Naw, Oh, I know now. She said you was a perfect ignoramus."

Eastern Man—Tom's your house, eh? My grandma! What does this mean? It stands on wheels!

Western Man—Yes wouldn't have the wheels on the roof, would you?

"But wheels! Wheels, sir! What are they for?"

"Why, to keep out of the way of new business blocks, of course. Where d'yo come from anyhow?"

At Mrs Trick Scorch's reception.

She—Did you manage to get me some supper in that awful crush around the table?

He—Yes; I have three fried oysters in my coat pocket, and some chicken salad in my handkerchief.

"Oh, how good of you!"

Smith—I see you are keeping company with Miss Jones yet.

Brown—Yes.

"Does it mean business?"

"Can't tell. But I wouldn't be surprised if I received a proposal soon."

"Look 'ere Sal!" yelled a Texas woman to her aldrat girl. "Don't bend over that well so fast! You'll fall in some day, and then we'll have to drink from the creek!"

"I see you advertise for a feeder," said a seedy-looking tramp, who had called at the office of a rural journal.

"I do," replied the editor, "but I want an expert, and your looks are against you."

In the theatre:

"But why do you weep? The acting is certainly not so touching."

"Excuse me, I am bewailing the money I paid to come in!"

Wife (to husband who has stumbled over a pair of her shoes)—Don't be so impatient, John! I never saw a man who has so

[FOR THE MONITOR.]
ONE MAY DAY.

BY THE PRIOR[illegible].

Crowned with Spring's brightest blossoms,
Bearing a wand of fame,
Over the sunlitten mountains
The glad May morning come,
Up to the heavens rejoicing
Sound the lark's merry song.
In his jubilant sonnets voicing
The glee of the feathered throng.
The winds o'er the broad savannas
Waved billowy leagues of bloom,
And flooded the air with the scented
Of a very sweet perfume.
Then was laughter, and light, and music,
Deep calm upon land and sea,
O never a shade of sorrow
To darken the May-Day lees.

"Ah!" I said, "What a wealth of beauty
This month of our Lady brings,
A glimpse of Heaven's outer portals;
A rustle of Angels' wings
Seems near us, for children's voices,
Aquiver with innocent mirth,
Are filling with joyfulness
The beautiful hamlets sleepeth.
Month dear to our Lady's servants;
Behold! the embowled air
Is vocal with strains of worship,
Is echoing to psalm and prayer,
As the tones of the morning Ave
Girdles the wide earth round,
Pilgrims are on the heavenly greeting,
With its shower of hallowed sound."

And lo! as time drifted onward,
And the great sun wrapped in Night,
Ultra gold upon vale and hill top
Burned the Zenobeshiah's fire;
Kindling shadow the entire
Gemmed with the opal dew,
Years floral incense drifted
Up to the skies so blue.
All for our Lady's honor
Shone then the golden land,
In raiment of emerald splendor,
Jewel with a thousand dyes;
Till over the faintest valley,
As the bright sun sank to rest,
Again with lovely eyes sweet greeting
Hung out the Ave blest.

BY THE ATLANTIC.

Also where the great St. Lawrence
And his tributary streams,
Half-robed from their lay bondage,
Flashed back day's shifty gleams;
One who had trod rejoicing
The royal road of pain,
One of our Lady's servants
Bound by love's own sweet chain,
Knelt in the vesper shining
The voice of the Angel call:
"O chosen and faithful servant,
Then art freed from life's poisoning thrall;
All thy long years of suffering
Are as a dream, even for her. Enthroned
They are laid by our Queen and Mother
At the feet of the Crucified.
No more through earth's thorny pathways
Must thy patient footsteps years;
The child of our Heavenly Lady,
She bids thee hasten home."

Answering the joyous summons
Thrilled the pale-cheeked beauty,
Rent with the woes of parting,
Yet longing to be at one
With the Lord of Life and Deathlight!
Smile upon suffering sister
Then over, dread Home of Charity,
Are your works of mercy spread.

Then, as a child at even
Slakes his weary playtime,
He, plaided unto our Saviour
The trust in that she so long
Life's desires, its toils and trials,
Its hours of pleasure and pain,
Were merged in the hope of heaven.
He had wrought so well to gain.
And as he the May's first glory
Came the message that gave release,
And the heart so true to Rein,
The pock-heart fetter, pause;
While the shore that a'er sentland and sea
Is sicoline light shone down,
Crowned to whisper: Hope and courage,
By his crown he has won his crown."

ST. IGNATIUS' PICTURE.

A noble face! a martial mien!
A warrior of old, I ween,
Whose dauntless deeds so brave,
Bright-gemmed on history's glowing page,
By his own he has won his crown."

The pulse that throbs the grave.

Rise, the sage of ancient days,
Where thoughts are mirrored in the lays,
Then deep and broad beneath dark thrill;
Or, parchment, 'tis a victor great,
Whose laurel wreath is ever fair,
At conquests dreamt of still.

Ah! no—the face that beams so bright,
Pale as alone with mortal light
Is bim of world-wide fame,
Who now 'mid God's great court above,
Chants great sonnets of love
To His eternal name.

Ignatius! 'tis a name divine,
Sacred which all virtues bine
Themselves in fond embrace;
A wonderous name that nerves such soul
To strive to gain its destined goal,
And see God face to face.

And prolong on that nobility salon,
Mrs. Leigh, who was a kind-hearted woman
In her way, noticed Grace's exhausted air, and attributing it to the heat and the confined schoolroom, suggested that the children should take a holiday.

"They looked a little pinned, poor things, themselves," she said. "I have been promising them a picnic all summer down on Briary Beach. Suppose you all bundle off together in the donkey cart and spend the day there. I will have a nice lunch put up for you. You can read for most of the day through shady lanes. You will be better for it, my dear, yourself."

They had gone about a mile, and were slowly climbing a sandy hill, Grace driving, and the two little girls and their brother chattering away in the highest spirits, when suddenly a pedestrian came out from the woods on the right, and, springing nimbly down the bank, was going in the opposite direction, when little May called aloud:

"Don't you remember me, Mr. Stranger? I'm the little girl who lost her pussy yesterday, in this village, and you were the kind gentleman to find it for me."

Grace would have given the world if the child had not spoken, for she had recognized again, only too well, that tall, lithe figure and that free, swinging step. She said to herself, "He saw me; he was hurrying away, and now this vexatious child has called him back; he will think I whispered to her to do it, and he and his bride will jeer at me all the more."

Stuyvesant Mortimer turned at the call, and, coming up to the cart with an impudentness, cried, holding out his hand to the child:

"Why, so it is, absolutely my little fairy, but now discomfiture no longer. We are going on quite an expedition, too, aren't we? A picnic, or something like it?"

Grace's whole body was a quiver of nerves. She sat with her eyes downcast and her face half averted, as though absorbed in studying her right hand, which held the reins.

"Oh, yes," answered May, "'on a picnic. And we're going to have such a jolly time. Dody says you are more coming, too!"

Stuyvesant Mortimer, with a hearty gayest laugh. "Jolly times are not so frequent with me, I assure you, but I can afford to miss a chance of one. But will Miss—Miss—I beg pardon for not knowing her name—allow me—good God! it is Grace herself!"

Up to this moment he had been so engrossed with the child that he had only a vague idea that there was a governess sitting next to her; but who the governess was, or even if she were pretty he had no thought. He now, as he looked up, rather expecting to see some sour visaged, middle-aged spinster, he beheld the sweet, downcast profile of the only woman who had ever touched his heart, and who was looking all the more lovely because of her half morning dress and the traces of sorrow and suffering on her face. Hence the broken ejaculation with which he checked the request he had been about half apostrophy to proffer.

His hat, too, was off in a moment. He looked so eager, so astonished, so glad, so rapturous, all in succession, that Grace, who had intended to be coldly at first, was herself astonished, nd—shall we say it?—flattered at her immediate effect.

For what could it mean? Was it possible there had been some terrible mistake? Surely that look, the passionate emotion of voice, were not counterfeit! Her head swam, and she thought she would faint.

"Miss Courtenay," said Mortimer, observing her hesitation, and mastering his own emotion with great effort, "I have been seeking you for an interview ever since my return from Europe, indeed, May 1 — and the pleasing tones of his voice were eloquence itself — "do in earnest what I proposed just now in jest! May I join your little party? I see that you think hardly of me. Perhaps I deserve it. But oh! give me a chance to treat to explain. The most criminal is allowed that. Afterward, if you say so, I will go away—forever—"

He did not wait for a reply in words. He had always been masterful, and Grace felt the old spell on her. She made no objection, therefore, when he went to the dumpy's head, and, muttering something about "helping it up the hill," took it by the bit and led it to the top of the ascent. Her heart was in such a flutter that she could not have spoken if she had tried. Of course he found his opportunity, and that before long. The beach was only a short quarter of a mile off, on the declivity of the hill below, and when the children, shoeless and stockingless, and with many a merry shout, were dabbling in the water, he drew Grace's arm within his own, and told his story, as he placed to and fro on the sands, with her by his side.

At first she had been cold, even haughty, for, after her surprise was over, she felt herself that there could have been no mistake, that he was false to the core—that he was only, even now, seeking to amuse himself. Yet when he drew her arm within his own, when he looked into her eyes with his frank look of innocence, and when he told his story in his frank, manly, yet impassioned way, she broken utterly down, and would have fallen into his arms if it had not been for the children playing so near. As it was, the tears rolled down her cheeks, and her eyes emphasized the low whisper in which she begged forgiveness for having doubted him. "Never doubt me, dear, for I love you so dearly!" he said, in a fervent whisper, and she, with a sigh, replied, "I believe you, Stuyvesant, and I will try to be worthy of your confidence." Yet, in spite of this, and of the fact that she was, even now, seeking to assume himself, he felt that he had drawn

EDITORIAL NOTES.

—In Baltimore it is proposed to put letter-boxes on the street-cars. This will bring a letter to the post office from any part of of the city in half an hour.

—An announcement by cable states that the Holy Father is about to issue an Encyclical on the difference between true and false Liberty—a distinction which is entirely unknown to a large class of people who think themselves very much enlightened.

—The Duke de Frias, one of the richest nobles in Spain, died last week in Madrid, of which city he was governor. His first wife was Miss Victoria Ralfe, daughter of world-renowned Irish comedian.

—Commenting on the recent death of King-Harman, the Dublin Freeman's Journal says: "Secretary Balfour subjected Col. King Harman to galling taxpayers and humiliations in regard to the salary bill, and is largely responsible for the latter's death."

—There is a minister away off in the north of England, the Home Journal asserts, who believes in gentle preaching to rich sinners. He would say, for instance: "Brethren, you must repent, as it were, and be converted, in a measure, or you will be lost, to some extent."

—Col. W. J. Finlay, the millionaire brewer of Toledo, Ohio, conspicuous for public benefactions, who died on the 20th ult., has left $25,000 each to the Home for the Friendless, St. Vincent's Catholic Orphanage, Protestant Orphan Home and the Protestant Hospital of Toledo.

—A Catholic Bishop has been assassinated. The victim is Mgr. Ohannes, the Catholic Armenian Bishop of Van, in Armenia. The murderers broke into his residence at night, and the Turkish authorities have already arrested four individuals, Armenians, on suspicion.

—The part that religion has taken in breaking the shackles of the slave in Brazil has been an important one, and was accelerated tenfold by the voluntary liberation of slaves by their owners in honor of the Papal Jubilee, at the recommendation of the Brazilian Bishops. The result is more gratifying as the influence that brought it about make the great social change a safe and bloodless one.

—During the three months from January 1st to April 1st, 1888, the population of Ireland was diminished by 6,642, leaving it, as estimated to the middle of the year 4,790,614. The Registrar-General announces that for the period 26 sub-Saxon 27,202 deaths and 17,807 marriages.

—"A Catholic Aspect of Home Rule," from the pen of the eminent English convert, Mr. Orby Shipley. The writer will establish the justice of the Irish claim on the principles of Catholic equity. The Catholic World for June is a number of great and varied interest. Among the contributors are Bishop Keane, Father Hecker, Katharine Tynan and Louise Imogen Guiney.

—A well known Anglican clergyman, Mr. Rivington, has become a Catholic. He was a member of the Society of "Cowley Fathers," and was formerly stationed at Philadelphia. He was received into the Church on Easter Sunday at Rome. An old friend having written to him lately to inquire whether or not the report was true, he wrote that he had become a convert, he believed that it was true and that his one regret was that he had not done so years ago.

—Nearly 1,500 signatures accompanied the protest which the Society of Friends (Quakers) presented to Mr. Gladstone some days ago against "the unchristian character of the Coercive Measures carried on in Ireland by the Government under the Crimes Act of 1887." They believe that "Force is no remedy," and they earnestly desire the substitution of a policy of conciliation in accordance with the teaching of Christ—"All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."

—Dr. Tanner, the faster, lives in New Mexico, where he has a 1,000-acre ranch. He is connected with a foraging association, which is intended to show that the lower passions are aroused principally by the use of animal food. He is now in Indiana trying to collect forty Indians to experiment with. He thinks that he can make them all good and long-lived by feeding them one meal a day of a light vegetarian diet. The doctor himself lives on one meal a day, breakfast.

—Here is a pun-picture of Ireland as England has left it after a century of forced union which has resulted in depopulating the country, wrecking its manufactures, ruining its commerce, and destroying its social and domestic happiness. A recent tourist who passed through the County Waterford, says: "The first street one meets on entering Dungarvan at the western extremity is called Stephen street. It consists of a single row of small houses; there are doors, roofs, windows and chimneys. Startling are the sensations with which the stranger discovers that every single house is deserted—every one! There is no sound within. The chimneys are smokeless. Such a ghastly, grim, suggestive place! The awful stillness of the desert is not half so saddening as the weird and desolate aspect of this array of tenantless homes." The vividness with which this and scene of desolation is depicted, needs no comment from the Minstrel in order to burn it into the hearts of all our readers.

Men who are Unworthy of American Citizenship.

Any man who goes through the mockery of becoming an American citizen for the sole purpose of impeding the progress of Religion in America is not only a dangerous member to the stability of the Republic itself, but he is also—strange paradoxical as it may appear—a bitter enemy of liberty. This will bring a letter to the post office from any part of the city in half an hour.

We notice by the daily papers that the members of an organization calling itself the British-American Association had a meeting last Thursday in order to promote interest among Englishmen on the importance of keeping American citizens. A number of speeches were made the tenor of which seemed to be that there was a great bond existing between England and America, yet it was to be regretted that few Englishmen became adopted citizens. But when a certain "Hr. Robert Nourse of Washington, D. C.," gave voice to his sentiments, he cast off the gauzy disguise in which his speechmaking predecessors had clothed their anti-Irish and anti-Catholic Utopian, and he boldly declared the organization to be nothing more nor less than an alliance to keep alive the fires of anti-Catholic bigotry.

Among the numerous reforms which these raw recruits of the Republic hope to bring with their thoroughbred spirit of English aristocracy, as alluded to by Mr. Nourse, are the following:

"We expect," he said, "to teach the American people that they are more to this English than to any other nation. . . . There are in this country 270,000 more British-American citizens than there are Irish-American citizens. This I say with all the emphasis that the dignity of the British name can."

It will be news to "the natives" to learn that America owes anything to Englishmen's scorn. And as for Mr. Nourse's assertion that there are 270,000 more British-American citizens in the United States than there are Irish-American citizens, Mr. Nourse must have manufactured his statistics solely to satisfy those gullable John Bulls who imagine that everybody who speaks the English language is an Englishman. But Mr. Nourse calls his fabulous estimate "a fact," but we pronounce it a most spurious fiction which cannot be supported by any official statistics ever issued in America.

Mr. Nourse continued to state the "expectations" of this West British Orange Association thus:

"We expect to preserve the American public school system. If these people think that we can do so by an act let them return to where they came from. We want the public schools to remain perfect religious liberty. When the Roman Catholic Church attempts to take the public school money for sectarian purposes, we stand aside and say, 'You shall not.' We say that not because we are Englishmen, but because we are Americans and love our country. Every word that is spoken against England is spoken against the warm English hearts that have found homes in this great and glorious country."

It is really surprising how this Republic has managed to survive until now without the aid of this faithful follower of fanatical Orangeism! Let us hope that the speech of Mr. Nourse calls his fabulous estimate "a fact," but we pronounce it a most spurious fiction which cannot be supported by any official statistics ever issued in America.

More Signs of Protestant Decay.

The local preachers who draw their salaries for filling Congregational pulpits on Sundays and preaching pleasant sermons full of sound, yet signifying nothing, held a meeting last week at which it was generally admitted that the attendance of men at congregational services had fallen off to an alarming extent during the past few years of being permitted to enjoy the proud distinction which should embellish every alien when he affiles himself to the best of all governments.

Italy's New Criminal Code.

A colegrame announces the fact that great excitement exists among the Catholics of Europe in consequence of the recent promulgation of the new Criminal Code which the Italian Parliament has at last decided to issue the imprisonment of the Pope and every Cardinal, Bishop and Priest in Italy, if any of them in any way offend against the laws of the usurper who at present forms the government of that country. The cablegram says that the code is very explicit in its requirements that all ecclesiastics shall not in any way interfere with politics, nor oppose or criticise in any way the official acts of the Government. Violations of this act are to be punished by imprisonment from three months to a year. There is no possible exception made, and as the Pope has been engaged in a direct contest with Umberto for years, this law creates great excitement, and its rigid enforcement will certainly have great effect on European politics.

If these statements are true, there is an end to liberty of speech and of conscience in Italy. But we doubt very much if the other Powers of Europe will commit with Italy in its cruel measures. Any attempt to imprison or to exile the Pope, simply because he criticised the Italian Government, would raise a cause among the Powers of Europe, and such an outrage would precipitate a war sherein Italy would have to stand single-handed against the Sovereign Pontiff is not an ordinary citizen. He possesses prerogatives by virtue of his sacred character, which will be strictly protected, and though the Freemasons of Italy may formulate laws to enslave the consciences of the Bishops and priests of Catholic ecclesiastics, they will find themselves in a very painful and uncomfortable attitude when they undertake to use force in order to legislate itself.

It is not so very long ago since Germany tried to silence the voice of the Vicar of Christ by a law which declared among other proscriptive clauses against the Catholic Church—that all Letters containing from the Pope and addressed to Catholic Prelates in Germany, should be subjected to the scrutiny of a Board of Reasoners appointed by the Government. But when Bismarck found that the number of hybrid-headed Anarchy was abroad through the land, he was glad to abrogate all such laws from the Code, and to beg of the Vicar of Christ to send back the exiled Bishops and priests to their episcopal sees. The same course may occasion the same results in Italy, and this new prosecution of persecution which the Italian Government has outlined, may lead through a Calvary to the throne of Umberto for years, this law creates great excitement, and its rigid enforcement will certainly have great effect on European politics.

If these statements are true, there is an end to liberty of speech and of conscience in Italy. But we doubt very much if the other Powers of Europe will commit with Italy in its cruel measures. Any attempt to imprison or to exile the Pope, simply because he criticised the Italian Government, would raise a cause among the Powers of Europe, and such an outrage would precipitate a war wherein Italy would have to stand single-handed against the Sovereign Pontiff is not an ordinary citizen. The Church in New South Wales.

Prior to Cardinal Moran's departure for Rome, an immense meeting of Catholic Australians inaugurated a parting demonstration in order to manifest their devotion to the Prince of the Church who has won the unanimous love of all the people in the Southern Hemisphere with whom he has come in contact.

The wonderful growth of the Church in New South Wales in the short space of time that four years during which Cardinal Moran has been in charge of the Diocese of Sydney, is thus succinctly set forth in the Address which the Catholic body presented to their beloved Prelate:

"And now, your Eminence, it becomes my duty to say a few words of your second pastoral work since the day of your arrival in this country. You landed in this colony ten than four years ago. I shall not, save in the most general way, endeavor to show what you have really done during this brief period. The great loss has deterred you where from such to such, and has been accentuated to look to our position on Monday morning for the proofs either of the foundation of a church laid or the continuance of one already begun. Of the foundation, the opening, or the enlargement of some house of religion (Applause) and we find ourselves experiencing a sense of bitter disappointment. Of the work, we are happy to say, we are engaged in one or other of these body-works.

"I have before me the particulars of the cost of erection of 63 entirely new churches during your stay in Sydney, and the enlargement of 11 old churches, of the new presbyteries, of the schools, and of the are high schools (applause), of the erection of a prelate's house, the erection of convents, comprising houses for the Sisters of Charity, Sisters of Good Shepherd, Sisters of Mercy, Sisters of Poor Clares, of the Sacred Heart of Mary, of the Carmelites. Now, if I have before me the cost of the Holy Ghost, and of that beautiful Order for the man of Nazareth, the Order of Christ, I will demonstrate how been deeply indebted to the Order of Christ, the Holy Ghost Company of Mary (Applause). You have enlarged in some cases, as in the case of Mount St. Aegidio and the Convent Mount St. Vincent, by conversion from into Convents of Mercy for the Marist Brothers, the Christian Brothers, and the Brothers of St. Patrick.

You have reared one of the noblest buildings in the Southern Hemisphere, the Seminary of College of St. Patrick, at Manly (Applause). Your Eminence, the Sydney College is the city, and St. Joseph's for the Marist Brothers, at Hunters Hill, are assuming the proportions of the great Religious colleges known in Europe. (Applause). You have established 11 boarding house schools for girls. You have, in the various Orders, brought from Ireland table institutions and to the completion of our great convent of Mount St. Joseph's, and you have founded a new religious for girls at Liverpool, an hospital for convalescents at Manly, and the Sydney Hospital at Trooper, an orphanage for boys at Newcastle, and a home for the aged at Randwick, the children's hospital and home of the Good Shepherd, the nursing home at Mount street, St. Leonard's, and the home of the Little Flower, and the neglected girls at Leichhardt; and you have introduced into New South Wales the Redemptorists, the Sisters of Mercy (Applause). Your Eminence, I have to thank you for the work of your Diocese in Sydney, and I have added to your dioceses 63 priests and 218 Brothers and Sisters.

"Your Eminence, we have nearly doubled the number of members of our religious Orders, and we have increased the number of our priests, to occupy its attention for hours, and which I trust will be more fortunately stated I believe, to the last farthing, that the Catholic Church in Catholic objects in this diocese during your stay, amounts to £1,000,000 sterling, and the total expenditure in the same period, 1884, the sum of £428,700, £2,145,500.

Whose Americans?

Charles Dudley Warner, the well-known American author, thus delivers himself to men who constitute the best American citizens:

"There seems to be a good deal of doubt as to what an American is. The native is not always the best, nor exactly the full, even when improved. In fact, when he is, he is apt to be disappears. I used to think that to be an American, one had to be born in New England, or to have come there at a very early day, with the serious intention of having everything by who was just right, born in the Year of Grace the date of 1621. In the city of New York, the Germans of Pennsylvania, and the French of Louisiana seem to have a different idea about it. In many cases, I have already stated this important question, and am disposed to think, on mature consideration, that a man may be a good, and even a good American, without being that he may have been born in another land. As to the question of the Indian, I prefer to see that "He Hill," the "maker, or the Indian, I prefer to put on Protestant to bring Francis destroy to an agreement with the Indian." Indeed, I think it look no further than the Holy Scriptures, I believe, that a Protestant is a Christian. It is absurd to talk about the supreme, the Holy Bible. The Bible is a dead letter without an interpreter, and the Protestants contradict their own theory, for each sect has its own interpretation of the Bible, which they consider as important and as infallible as that they will not allow any one to join their communion unless he will give his entire, or assent to their particular creed. To be consistent, they have no right to insist upon their private interpretations as terms of communion. The only question they can consistently ask is "Do you believe in Christ, and take that for your sole guide?" Indeed I have recently seen a Protestant Bishop, a man of great learning, and a man of great eloquence, and a man of great piety, and the sooner they abandon all their cherished denominational creeds and agree upon that platform the sooner will the Millennium dawn, and the more hope will there be of their coming together in a Christian Church union or alliance, after which they are to be, and are, and they, but hopelessly, seeking.—Philadelphia Review.

Vandalism in Rome.

Through the mouth of a certain Signor Sacchetti, Rome, the city partly in Rome have been unfolding a programme. Briefly stated, it amounts to simply to the destruction of the city of the Popes. The Catholics will find their ground at the municipal elections. With a view of destroying their peace and influence, the infidels, as they call themselves, have introduced a bill of the Pall Mall Gazette the other day in London, are getting from Italy for a great struggle. Furthermore, they hope to be able to have the common schools, to place still greater restrictions on the liberty of the Catholic Pontiff, and to efface, as far as possible, the noble Christian monuments for which the city is indebted to its pagan rulers. Art and religion will suffer at the hands of these enemies of the Church conceived in their doings, for they are, it would seem, all as at ground of taste and as irrational as were the Huns and Vandals.

Enchantering the Cable.

The Sydney Freeman's Journal thus enchantures the false and sensational cablegrams which are sent all over the civilized world, for their manipulated purpose to circulate "startling" news concerning the Pope or the Irish question:

"Put out your trust in princes; in good advice, put not your trust in politicians is a maxim and not least in cable gram sensations in the southest africa of all. Facts, the only way of getting at the truth of a cablegram is to take it in the very opposite sense to which it is delivered, but it is a most freating of matters connected with Irish affairs that the cable writer pers so long. What a mistake would call an Australian cable of the first magnitude. Hardly the good work the head of the London cable office are has amused himself by concocting fairy tales touching the Pope's intentions respecting the Irish question. Lord Morna's future and such like news of which backwoodsdge must be decidedly hoaxed by hoaxs. We are happy to say, however, that through the courtesy of Pastor Allen, who knows more about the doings at the Vatican than the Pope himself does, we are able to place before our readers the real state of affairs. Cardinal Moran is going to Rome for the purpose of being created Pope, while the present Pope is to be appointed his coadjutor, with the right of succession. Joe Biggar will then be made a Cardinal and Archbishop of Dublin in the place of Cardinal Logue, who will be appointed to the vacant Archbishopric of Armagh. Meanwhile, the business of the Australian Catholics will be transacted by a Vicar-General, author Zachary Barry of David Buchanan Hayes, who will be assisted in his duties by a Sheriff with the utmost enthusiasm, and the highest praise is due to the Sydney Catholics, whose diplomatic correspondence with Mgr. Persico brought about the Papal intervention. Some persons may not place implicit reliance in the statements of the Sydney Freeman's Journal, but it will gradually grow upon them if they will only wait long enough, and it will prove as reliable as the bulls of the news Sydney daily sling by the London Jesuits.

Russia and the Holy See.

An English paper states that news from Russian Poland announces the approaching legend of the Concordat between the Holy See and the Russian Empire. It will be well for the Polish language, which will be permitted in all religious ceremonies. This fact, if true, is a very significant denial of the gossip of the Liberal press, which make one of every article to assert that Russia is the great bugbear of the Vatican. The Muscovite is not the only Power in the Concordat are

1 The appointment of a Roman Legate from accredited to the Vatican, the suppression of exemptions from the jurisdiction of the bishops, and the right of the bishops to visit the clergy, which hitherto, although it belongs to the bishops, which hitherto, although it belongs to the bishops, which hitherto, although it belongs to the bishops

Farm and Home.

Worth Knowing.

Wet tobacco applied to a bee or a wasp sting will give relief.

Never keep honey in a cellar. A dry room is the place for it.

A wart can be removed by touching it several times a day with castor oil.

Working in cold water when unaccustomed is a frequent cause of disfiguring pimples.

To make labels adhere to tin or other metal add a little glycerine or sugar to the gum used for fixing them.

Money is not merely as valuable as character, for money cannot buy the respect of thoughtful men and women.

The best way to mend torn leaves of books is pasting them with white tissue paper. The print will show through it.

When you want to take out a bureau drawer, pass, heat the poker, run it slowly along the old putty and soften it loose.

To clean straw matting, boil three quarts of bran in one quart of water, and wash the matting with the water, drying it well.

It is not what a man makes but what he saves that adds to his prosperity; step the leaks. "Wanton waste makes want" said.

The air of a sick room should always be kept fresh that there will be no perceptible difference upon coming into it from the outer air.

For sore throat there is nothing better than the white of an egg beaten stiff with the sugar it will hold and the clear juice of a lemon.

The dampness which arises from exposure to the air may be remedied by sponging the face with equal parts of brandy and rose water.

If the face seems constantly dry, rub it with a trifle of olive oil every night for awhile; if too oily, put a little borax in the water used for bathing it.

Never put hot water into a glass unless it contains a spoon. This will serve as a conductor for the heat of the water and lessen the risk of breaking.

At dinners given in the best society the toothpick has no place at least in the dinner room or drawing-room. In its pristine glory it exists only in the hotels.

Sunlight is often the very best medicine—especially for children and for elderly people—and the more hours they get of it the better are their chances for life and health.

Vapor bathe will clear the skin. Powdered charcoal taken on first rising in the morning, on the point of a knife, is a remedy for biliousness is the remedy required.

A Good Housewife.

A woman's instinct of cleanliness is so strong that she will actually squander time in unnecessary work. This is going further than any semblance of reason will attempt to excuse. There is no sense in working like this. A woman can be a good housekeeper without taking all her time to do her housework.

If she cannot, let her after all be satisfied with being an ordinarily good one, and take some of the time from her previously self imposed drudgery for reading, self-improvement and recreation. These housekeepers who are looking so much superfluous work every day never think of such a thing as reading a daily newspaper, or gathering information that will enable them to improve the quality of their work.

The most intelligent housekeeper, and agreeable, and useful one too, is not always forbidding up everything, and yet she has house as clean that no sense detects anything useless—the housewife ch) is a companionable sort of person, at least fairly well informed regarding the events of the day as well as her special daily duties, and who finds time to get out of that revolving grind of work that extinguishes a manifestation of cheerfulness wonderfully that may make her a lovely wife if they are not laid aside for that perpetual cleaning and antiquing of work that makes every one uncomfortable at home. Such a housekeeper is by no means a rarity, and her opposite the one who squanders time in superfluous duties, ought to cultivate her acquaintance.

A Merry Heart.

We may apparently have all of this world's blessings but to constant observers are in any way necessary to make up the sum of human happiness and still look the one thing useful, the crowning blessing—the warm, grateful, merry heart that can appreciate our heavenly Father's gifts; while some humble person who lacks in our judgment has not enough will find her life full of blessings for which to be grateful, because she has the heart to make them her own. She will be the one who always finds a welcome, for she always brings a bright thought or a little gift of love, or some to lend a helping hand to those who need encouragement. And who of us under any circumstance does not need a word of cheer? Not one.

But this same "merry heart" is a great beautifier. Rob thought of our lives leaves its impress on our faces. If we have thoughts full of envy or discord, are allowed to run riot and fearful discontent reigns supreme in the heart, even though we never intend to speak the words, let us remember that our faces will invariably tell the story. No matter how many efforts we may put forth to convince the world that if we were situated then and so we would be lovely characters, the world knows better; "that is," if the habitual frown or pout has found a settled place in the face. Those frowns are like the hands of Lady Macbeth, from which spots can never be washed away; they have formed a part of our nature.

One Imports of Fruits.

The United States imports annually about 50,000,000 pounds of prunes, 7,000,000 pounds of figs, 35,000,000 pounds of raisins, 5,000,000 pounds of almonds, 18,000 barrels of oranges and lemons and 250 cartloads of other fruits. This vast amount of imported fruit can be replaced by the State alone, to say nothing of the enormous quantities of other fruits indigenous to this country which it can also produce. It is only a few years ago that foreign grapes were brought to Los Angeles for Winter use, and now, instead of sending to Europe, we raise for better grapes and can supply the United States and then have a surplus for the consumers in other lands. Last year we sent 2,500 carloads of fruit to the East, and this year the shipments will, in all probability, run well up to 5 000 carloads. For some of our canned fruits, we have the world for a market, and our apples are sent to Australia, China and Japan. It is only a question of a very short time when the 270,000 paid annually for foreign fruits will be a speed of for the California products of vastly superior quality.—Commercial Bulletin.

The Blind Man and the Milk.

One blind from birth asked a man who sold cow "What color is milk?" The man who could see replied: "The color of milk is like white paper." The blind man asked: "This color, then, resembles in the hand like paper?" The man who could see replied: "No; it is white, like white flour." The blind man asked: "Then it is soft and pliable, like flour, is it?" The man who could see replied: "No; it is simply white, like a rabbit." The blind man asked: "Then it is downy and soft, like a rabbit?" The man who could see replied: "No; white is a color exactly like snow." The blind man asked: "Then it is cold, like snow is?" And in spite of all the comparisons which the man who could see made still the blind man was wholly unable to comprehend what the color of milk really was.

Family Fun.

An Excited Warrior.

Taking five newspaper war-maps under one arm and a copy of the Times under the other, Mr. White left the office, and proceeded directly homewards, feeling more patriotic every moment.

"Old wife's going to lay 'em right out, Sam," he said as he dropped his hat in the hall.

"Did you order the flour?" she asked in a careless tone.

"Flour! What do I care about flour! The Russians have got Kars and half of the Turkish army!"

"Have, eh! Well, I hope that paper-hanger will be here in the morning. You did n't think to see about—"

"Right here is Kars, and right here is where the Turks got mauled!" he exclaimed, as he knelt on the floor and traced out of the maps.

"Did, eh! Say, John, can't you rake off the lawn this morning, and did you see about the whitewashing?"

"Will you talk about whitewashing when all Europe is convulsed with war!" he Seriously demanded, as he shook the other four maps at her.

"I—I'd like these onion beds marked out to day," she replied.

"Onion beds marked out, when this very copy of the Times editorially predicts that a million armed men will be rushing at each other's throats in less than 60 days!"

The rug a dead sewer until his finger rested on the City of Erzerum, when he shouted:

"Here she is. It right around here they are making the Turks howl for mercy!"

"By the way, John," she softly remarked, as she locked up, "don't you think that summer kitchen will have to be re-shingled this spring?"

The girl who does general housework says he loss the few times he broke into 500 pieces, and hanged the Times against the wall with a powerful jump as he jumped out doors; but girls are sometimes prejudiced. Mr. White was in the corner grocery at half past 11, saying to the proprietor:

"D-n it make your blood jump to read of the European situation!"

And the proprietor raked the cheeks in his cheese for a clean stand reply:

"Seems like I shall had to lull doe boys who out away mit die hafie."

How can you expect any body but a warrior to feel as warriors do!

A Man of Conviction.

The editor of an agricultural paper stopped at a Kentucky farmhouse, and after a short "earthery" and "croppy" conversation said:

"My friend, would a'n you like to subscribe for a first-class agricultural paper?"

"Well, I dunno 'bout that. Reckon I'd the mountain 'pears tee be a little the heavy."

"What does your paper propose to do? Wear do it stan' when the Methodis' an' Baptis' distrimes come up for discussion, as the feller says?"

"Oh, we have nothing to with that. Our paper is devoted to the interests of the farmer."

"How so?"

"Oh, it tells him what is the best time to plant certain crops, and how to cultivate them."

"That all?"

"Oh, no, it is full of matter that is of interest to farmers."

"All 'bout cabbages, I reckon."

"Oh, yes."

"Says or leetle erbout the watermelons, I reckon."

"Yes."

"But do it say erbout the peaches?"

"Tells how to cultivate them."

"Ah ha, but yes say it ain't got nothin to do with a Methodis or Baptis?"

"Nothing at all."

"Why if as Methodis an' Baptis' out inter ec fight, yo' paper would n't keer which ol' wipped, I reckon."

"I could n't take sides."

"Well, I don't, I'd'cided I want it."

"Why, my dear sir, I—"

"No, I don't want it. I'm takin' ar still-house paper, an' you let it yelle for the Baptis' everytime. No; I don't want no milk an' cider paper."

A Clever Boy.

"Father," said a hopeful sprig, "how many lives are there on that table?"

"Why," said the old gentleman, as he looked complacently on a pair of finely roasted chickens that were smoking on the table, "there are two, my boy, there are two."

"Two!" replied young smartness, "there are three, sir, and I'll prove it."

"Tsh," replied the old gentleman, who was a plain matter-of-fact man, and needed things to be as they stood "I'd like to have you prove that."

"Easy done, sir; really done! Is n't that one?" laying his knife upon the first.

"Yes, that's certain."

"And isn't that two?" pointing to the second; "and don't one and two make three?"

"Really," said the father, turning to the old lady, who was listening with astonishment to the learning of her son; "really this boy is a prime and deserves encouragement. Here, mother, you take one fowl, and I'll take the second, and John may have the third for his learning."

He Did n't Like Culture.

"Don't talk to me about culture and refinement," said a New York alderman, who had been putting on a great deal of style of late because he had made a little money by keeping saloon.

"What is your objection to a man of culture?" asked the gentleman of whom he was conversing.

"They are so stuck up and are always trying to make you feel their superiority. I never make people feel my culture and refinement. You can run with me for twenty years and never know that I had any."

"That's so," replied the party of the second part.

The Agent had Tried It.

Coal Dealer—I say, Premium, this coal strike makes my losses terrific. I want to insure my yard against fire. What's the cost of a policy for ten thousand?

Insurance Agent—What coal is it some idea you sent me last year?

"Anthracite."

"O, I would n't insure it, if I were you. It won't burn, you know."

She had Reason to be Anxious.

Wife (whose husband, realizing the need of exercise, has bought a bicycle)—I shall be so anxious, John, dear, until you learn to ride it well.

Husband (kindly) Don't get nervous, fo dash little one. I shall be very careful.

Wife—I mean, dear, that John James's by that the bicycle cost over $100.

Miss Oldgirl (giggling)—Would you believe it, Mr. Lightfoot, that Washington's birthday and mine are on the same day.

"Impossible" replied Lightfoot. "Why you don't look half his age."

"Hello, Fudgely, shouted Robinson. "What makes you look so down in the mouth?"

"Why," said Fudgely, dismally, "I sent Miss Brown a valentine that cost me my week's salary, and I've just received cards to her wedding with that selfsh Smythe."

CATHOLIC SCHOOL EXHIBITIONS.

(CONCLUDED FROM THIRD PAGE.)

ST. VINCENT'S SCHOOL, VALLEJO.

VALLEJO, June 11, 1888.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:

Dear Sir—As affairs which was looked forward to for several months past in this pretty town by the young folks, and by many of the old people too, has come and gone. I refer to the annual musical and literary entertainment given by the pupils of St. Vincent's Orphan Asylum. The Parmer Opera House was crowded to its utmost capacity on Tuesday evening, the occasion being a celebration of its founder, the patron saint of that excellent institution. The great interest which the event evoked was shown by the large audience which came to greet and encourage the young performers. The girls acquitted themselves in their various parts in a manner which clearly displayed talent and as well as careful training and preparation. Juvenile performers are always interesting and doubly so when the end in view is a pleasure, and moral and intellectual culture. Interspersed between the various pieces of a strictly musical character, which formed the main features, were prominent features on the occasion. The leading parts were very creditably filled by the larger girls, the little ones swelling the chorus with a charm and a relish like great especially their own.

The display of Annie Kane in the operetta "Little Bo Peep," was very good and was acknowed by a clear voice and powerful enunciation, the dia "Little Bo Peep" well. "Bye Bye" Fared well in the hands of Fanny Connolly. A "Tableau The Fire Fiend," was well rendered by Mary Connolly, Delphine Parmer and Mary Kane, which is a creation of a lively character. "Little Jack Horner" ably delivered by Annie McGuinness. "Barbara Frietchie," is a dramatical tale, was well performed by Misses Lillie Tobin, Maria Valdez and Nellie O'Keefe. The representation of the "English Virginia," was very creditable to Alice Walsh, Mary Rogan, Mary McManus, Mary Smith and Agnes McGettigan. Aida Rosenna made a very nice "Amazed." "The Battle of Lepanto," a recitation, was well rendered by the pupil, "Old Mother Hubbard," fared well in the hands of Minnie Lawrence who made a character of herself well in "Natural." "Little Washboy" mediated by Lizzie Lynch. "Little Boy Blue" mediated by Josie Vampole. "Little Bo Peep," equally good by Maggie Cahill. "Tiffy," the dog, was admirably done by Mary Connolly. Rose. The other little ones who did their parts well are too numerous to mention. Excellent music was furnished by the Italian dance band.

Need I say as that the affair was a great success and reflects much credit on the pupils of the Tomorrow's school and the Sisters of St. Dominic, who have charge of it. The Catholics of Vallejo are very proud of it, as it is a concern of another, at the head of which is Sister Ignatius, who is universally loved by all classes, which the Catholic girls receive at their hands will be a precious treasure to them in after life. Immediately after the exercises were over Misses Annie McGettigan, Angie Rosenna, Mary Rogan, Mary Connolly, Nellie O'Keefe and Mary Smith.

At the conclusion of the exercises Rev. Father Lynk, O. P., Pastor, stepped on the stage, and in a few appropriate remarks presented some of the graduates with a medal and diploma, and also a handsome bible presented as a token of appreciation. Father Lynk, O. P., expressed himself very highly pleased with the good work performed by the Sisters, and he would consider the gifts for their grateful and excellent services, and he felt sure that the parents of Vallejo might be proud of their children—he was certainly proud of them. Those were Fathers Lynk, O. P., and Lawler, O. P., there were Fathers Wheeler, Power, Wade, Dwyer of Benicia, and Aneton, O. P., of Martinez, present at the entertainment. S. D. W.

The exhibition hall, tastefully decorating for the occasion with evergreens and flowers, was crowded to its utmost capacity on Tuesday evening, the 12th inst., was a great day for St. Bridget's parish—it being the first annual commencement of the parochial school. The hall, which was beautifully decorated for the occasion, was filled to its utmost capacity, and it was hard to leave for want of even standing room. The programme was very creditably rendered by the girls and boys, and it was well carried out, that the audience never for a moment lost an interest in it. While every part of the programme was well rendered, the recitations by the boys, who represented the school, were very creditable, and drew loud applause from the crowded audience. The drama "Katrina" was very well rendered, and mention being merited by Misses Agnes Kirby, Annie Kane and Mary Lynch. The music was very creditable, and the singing of the pupils in the programme.

SAINT'S CONVERSION.

Era yet Faith's light had pierced the gloom,
That shrouded Albion's isle;
Fair Erin rose from her pagan tomb,
To hail in Truth's bright smile;
Still doubting gospel in pagan night,
And blindly bent the knee
To idols—monsters to the sight—
Enwrapped in mystery.
Half Europe to her gods of stone,
In a benighted worship bowed;
The votary at their stern nod,
Yielded all their praises loud.
While Erron proved her white wings,
Above the island earth,
Thou, Erin, rose to holier things,
Beneath thy second birth.
From your rolling, storm swept seas
St. Patrick—chosen one—
Was wafted by Faith's zealous breeze
To thine such Erin shore;
From hill and dale, where once before
The Druids their hymns intone,
Rose daring prayers from shore to shore,
Like incense to God's throne.
No homeplight hope yet; thou bright,
No reaper save God's word
Required to bring them to the light,
They came when Truth was planted;
While freedom smiled up on the land,
And peace hand waving there;
Bright Virtue held out her hand,
Or ev'ry side aware;
Fair Hope, with her cheerful face,
Had forgot the lake of stains;
While hatred deep rolled o'er the land,
The night of its blasting wave.
Though seven centuries were have laid,
Her gaping in the dent;
Yet still she hoped, yet still she prayed,
In God repeated her trust,
Though outward stripped yet still one gem,
Fleshed radiant from her breast;
Where one—looked eagerly on at the diadem,
Oppression's crown hangs now.
Through hatred's sword and bloody spear,
Rolled out her heart-blood free,
Yet still she hopt through every fear,
Her faith on purity.
To Honor's dear enchiling name,
A warmed cow'ne was she;
With glory crowned, her spotless frame
Shall last eternally.
Or Freedom, Nature's cherished child,
She is wished oft her heart;
The case is just remembered wild
To fall 'neath Treason's dart.
Oh! curse the traitor hands that sold
Their mother in her need,
For paltry sums of blood-stained gold,
Thy sons—the serpent's dart.
To God, Redeemer of the world,
His children all are bequeathed;
And with His church man standard furled,
His name she has maintained.
Oh! emerald land! oh! emerald land!
Many sufferings have you seen;
Your betrothed come at Saint's command,
Have given your mantle green.
Yet through the gloom that shrouds her now,
The star of Hope appears,
It lightens up again her brow
Dispelling her fears.

HER SADDEN HUMAN HEART.

Then, Son of God, in torments dread
Upon the Cross didst die,
Thy Precious Blood in torrents spread,
Until Thy Heart was dry;
Thy Precious Blood, Love's liquid fire,
Burst from Thy Sacred Heart,
Wrought in its frames Thee dilat expire
A Victim, to impart
New life of grace to Adam's race;
Then, venom of the serpent's dart,
Sin's death-stab to efface.

Three hours, Thy Heart upon the Cross
Was in sad agonies;
Yes, all Thy life It felt Death's throes
Through every minutes;
At Forlorn Cary Jesus, Sat,
While its dark wave was filled—
Where 'mong Thy Virgin Mother's breast,
Thy God-Man's Heart first thrilled;
Tis life, its human sea of woes,
The Passions' wave of Association,
Unto Thy Heart's first throb arose,
In fear Or opposed the Incarnation.

When Gloria in Excelsis earth,
With peace to men first heard,
Angels hence announced the Birth
Of God's Incarnate Word;
Then Babe Divine, in Bethlehem's cave,
Heart swell beneath such shock,
The value of Calvary's stormy wave,
Whose blisses recal Thee purged,
For three and thirty years.

Grief tried
Each beating of His Heart,
But as the night before His died,
Love what Grief's bosom dart;
Wake ye His Humanities power as God,
Is love for man seemed spent,
Wake giving man His Flesh and Blood,
The orisons of Judas' rent

Thus Human Heart—Ingratitude's
Deadly pain, in the form of Judas Iscat
Effect crimes of future multitudes.

His Sacred Human Heart was crushed
In midnight's lonely hour,
Pain more and terrible, than there wakened
With magic, while the shower
Of Precious Blood in streams, earth wet;
But near be whom Vera shed,
Man alone his Saviour did insult,
And from his Saviour fled.

Oh! Sacred Heart—Man with cool His side,
His Sacred Heart—Man—Redeemer,
In Precious Blood Redemption's Tide,
The issue, the last drop drew
Wom He for mankind's rite had died;
And be our sin or great or low,
When we from life depart,
Thy Mercy, Jesus, be imparted
His Sacred Human Heart."

CALL ME BARLY, WIFE YONAH.

"Now, wake me up at 6 o'clock,"
He said on Friday to half;
"To morrow is my busy day,
I'll get up early to-day."

His patient wife, who previously
Experienced bad tried,
Said nothing only looked at him,
And softly, softly sighed.

The eight passed on the morning came,
At 6 the said, "My own,
It's 6 o'clock, I know, you said—
Is grateful, 'Lemme 'lone!'"

At 7 she gently tried again,
But once again without
The slight last semblance of success—
He only snapped, "Let out!"

At 7 she crept almost failed
And turned to leave the room
For as she spoke she had to doubt
A look fixing at her home.

She thought he sweet at 9 o'clock,
And gave up trying then,
And he whose busy day it was
Got up at half past ten.

Then came the tide of bitterness
That awaited her early
For breakfast—"Half half past ten!
Why didn't you wake me up?

True Till Death.

A Story of Ireland and Greece.

BY R. LYNCH.

CHAPTER I.

The resemblance which Donagh Fitzgerald bore to the portrait of the famous Lord Edward, lately the property of the Duke of Blockbirch, was striking enough to convince his friends and some of the less unredulous members of his family, that the boy was really, in some unaccountable way, directly descended from that young hero, and stood at the end of a century, as the other had done before, a possible point of lustre and noble pride.

His face was one of delicate beauty and finish—an extremely sensitive face, with soft, dark blue eyes that seemed, perhaps, too consciously sorrowful and too passionately earnest. And his smile, when he did smile, had that pathetic expectancy and sweetness in it that outnerves of oppression and thwarted hopes have stamped upon the Irish smile. The smile of no prosperous and universally-esteemed land can ever quite be like it, nor touch so powerfully the very heart of feeling. Everything about him was eloquent of a refinement and spirituality that carried the fatal prophecy of unsuccess, and the fire of enthusiasm that burst in the beautiful eyes was that which the grave and practical world likes to designate as madness. All his capacities for passion, and hope, and high impersonal devotion were concentrated round one holy object; each breath he drew was steeped half in worship, half in unpeinelable faith for the past and the future of his country.

When Donagh left Clingowen Wood, his father had destined him for the medical profession, but the boy's frail constitution and nervous temperament, with that strange appearance he were of looking out of spirit land upon the world around, decided Fitzgerald Senior not to put from the matter of a profession upon him for a while.

Donagh spent the time that was not devoted to the study of history in the study of the times—looked eagerly on at the national struggle in Ireland, joined the Land League, and attended meetings until his hand turned dizzy in the clamour of strife and words and in the pictures of endless, unassuaged pain.

"Is there never to be anything for us now but impotent speech? Are we to hurry all hope of doing finest battle for our liberty, as other nations have done, and can it be good that that this great change should have worked itself over the face of the earth?"

He argued the question out with his grandmamma, and mentally decided friends, Dick O'Mara, who, a peasants Land-leaguer himself met Donagh's earnest patriotism with that tolerant and benignant indulgence that was pleasant to behold exercised by a giant towards a fabled and delicately formed enchantment. Indeed, O'Mara's partiality for Donagh might be accounted among his special weaknesses. His very practicability and disposition to measure his desires with the possibilities of attainment made him the keener to perceive the nobility of a character and exclusive nature like young Fitzgerald's.

One evening, Dick was sitting in his room with Donagh, when a knock sounded. Former Donagh, with an absent and unconvinced, as he drew a chair over near the fire-place, and passed a hand all round the feathery dark curls that lightly massed themselves over his head.

O'Mara noted the weariness of complete exhaustion in the gesture, and also the absence of any smile of greeting.

"Anything wrong, Donagh?"

"Oh, no," Donagh answered, quickly. A tremulous color waved into his face, and faded out as swiftly, and the long fingers of his slender hand seemed to flutter with imperfectly repressed nerve thrills, made by deed, his painfully visible anxiety and emotion, a sharp contrast with the chief indolence of physical strength and good humoured self-possession of Dick.

"Nothing, Dick, only I have been to see Mr. Mac Mare, Donagh, and—"

"Mac! she repeated, arching her pretty brows impatiently.

"Mave," he corrected, softly, "I have the highest respect and affection for you. I don't know why you scorn me."

"I don't want respect, I am not old enough for that. I want you to like me as a boy. I like you; to look glad when you see me, and smile."

"But I am glad always to see you, dear Mave," he explained in pathetic gravity. "It would be a positive pain for me to come here, and not see you."

The door suddenly opened, and an old man stood on the threshold looking at them in a perplexed inquiry.

"I was accusing this bad boy for not coming to get for me an the letter, Donagh," Mave cried gleefully. "Tight I'm to have to pay."

"Hon away, kitten, and find some other bad boy to play with besides this lad's heart," and her father, smiling.

"She is a very charming child," Donagh remarked apologetically.

The old man glanced sharply at him, and nodded in silence. In the table before which they seated themselves was a three board with a large sheet of paper dotted and marked with lines in pen and ink.

"This movement of ours, last night, I see, after much study, was an incentive one. It left our weakest points exposed to the enemy's battery."

"How so? I should like to follow your study, Donagh sad, leaning eagerly over the paper.

"I let work it out on the chess board. We'll say I am England, being the stronger, I have my pieces in advance, until Donagh sad, "Ah, I see, I have left the king's bishop's pawn unprotected."

"Yes, she did, and so did England. Donagh conceded, dubiously. "And why, my Irish Ireland?"

"I am afraid that the feeling on the Continent for both countries is mark-ably different. "You'll see half for yourself by-by. By the way, did not we arrange you should start to-morrow night?"

Donagh assented.

"I have written letters for all the influential persons I know in Paris. Henry, I think, is a poor creature, but Chevarieux and Rochefort and the advanced party ought to be able to bring pressure to bear upon the Government. You are just the kind of emissary I have been seeking—gentle, well-mannered, and—"

"I will do my best, sir. If your influence can procure me an entrance to the Rue Mollaire, I promise to do my utmost to qualify myself specially for the future of a lighting man."

Pallette was it to see the light of enthusiastic conclusion in the face of the visionary old man reflected on the mobile countenance of the visionary boy, both from in their wild dreams and yearning towards the picture they had conjured up for admiration the troubled and handsome face before him.

"It was not, Donagh said, slowly.

"Why?"

"Perhaps later; not now," Donagh said, with a return of that kind of shrinking and uncertainty that puzzled Dick.

"If silence is best, I will not press you; but, are sure, Donagh, that it is best?"

"I think so, now," Donagh answered with an unusually slow, not seeking the clear, grey glance of O'Mara. "I think if you would understand."

"You have not found one very dense; I hope, in spite of my coarser organism," O'Mara persisted with a gentle smile.

He felt that there might be some indelicacy in his suggestion—disappointment, too, it was so openly withheld; but he was older, stronger, more sensible than this blind and visionary lad, and he was filled with uncomfortable fear that Donagh's very generosity and ardent nature should lead him into some deeply deplorable error out of which the grasp of friendship would be unable to extricate him if stretched forth too late.

"Then I blame me, don't fail me if anything should ever happen to separate us, Dick. Nothing will happen but I have always cared so greatly, perhaps exclusively, for you, that the thought of a possible estrangement between us in days to come would be a bitter thought, indeed, for me."

The subdued vehemence of his speech and look completely overpowered O'Mara, and all sorts of wild and dark conjectures flowed in vague succession through his mind. He called anxiously after Donagh, who had hurried away after his enigmatic appeal. "Good Heavens! The lad can't surely have gone some secret and dangerous society! He can't be on the point of eloping with some comely peasant girl. I'll go round, and have a talk with old Fitzgerald. We must do some to some decision between us. If moderate good sense is to be had, it is my duty to keep between a rattling Irish Tory and a flaming Nationalist."

CHAPTER II.

When Donagh found himself in the street he pressed his hand over his eyes, as if they ached with inward vision. He then drew back his head, and walked resolutely away. He had not far to go, for at the end of ten minutes he was knocking at a door in Kilkenny-road.

"Is that you, Lord Edward?" somebody asked from behind the door, as it opened, and a girl's pretty face was thrust forward with a mischievously mirthful expression. But Donagh's mind was bent on more distant thoughts than the noting of her engaging charm of face and voice. He liked her pleasant greeting well enough, and saw in her remote, unobscuring way that she was fair to look at, and fresh as any flower. He had should open the door for him on each of his frequent visits, and greet him with her air of regnlar and unconsciously provoking familiarity, made his entrance into the dim and quiet house a brighter, more human interest. But this was all the personal attention he gave her, forgetful that his supposed answerer lived Ireland none the less because he greatly loved Dorothy.

"Your father is expecting one, is he not?" he asked, with his sweet and ingratiating manner of recognition.

"Yes, he's not well. You will come upstairs."

She took his hand and drew him along the passage with a rhythmic dancing movement of her little feet, swaying her body forward from the waist upwards, and planning over her young mind to allow unnatural control small on of this perilous passage.

Donagh gently allowed himself to be thus led along, and when they reached the door of the room, he stopped, drew her back, and, looked straight into his eyes with a gravely tender look.

"You don't care one bit for me, Lord Edward." Dorothy, she loves me, but you don't. Papa says it is because you care too much for Ireland, but you ought be a little fond of me, and not care less for her." he said.

Donagh flushed earlier all over his delicate face, started back, and stared apprehensively at her.

"You are very lovely and very attractive, Miss Mare," he began, at last.

"Mae! she repeated, arching her pretty brows impatiently.

"Mave," he corrected, softly, "I have the highest respect and affection for you. I don't know why you scorn me."

"I don't want respect, I am not old enough for that. I want you to like me as a boy. I like you; to look glad when you see me, and smile."

Pallette was it to see the light of enthusiastic conclusion in the face of the visionary old man reflected on the mobile countenance of the visionary boy, both from in their wild dreams and yearning towards the picture they had conjured up for admiration a lovely dawn of liberty, prosperity, calm and wide spread patriotism.

When Donagh returned to his home, he was amazed to find the house thrown into the general confusion of sudden flight.

"Donagh, you are running away with us to-night to London," said his father sharply.

"I? Why to London?" asked Donagh anxiously.

"Don't bere me with questions. Somebody is packing your portmanteau upstairs. We have just time to eat something and catch the mail.

"But supposing I had not turned up at this particular moment?" Donagh asked quietly.

"Your mother would have gone by the next boat instead."

He seemed to settle the matter in the elder's eyes.

CONTINUED NEXT WEEK.

A WIFE'S DEVOTION.

Faithful Unto Death.

Winsfred was a beautiful girl when I first saw her. She was standing at the side of her lover at the marriage altar. She was slight and fair, and possessed that type of crimson cheek, which, like the reflection of a sunset cloud upon the lone waters of a quiet lake. Her lover, as he clasped her delicate hand within his own, gazed on her for a moment with unfeigned admiration, while the warm, crimson tide mounted to her cheek, shadowing at intervals his manly forehead. And they pledged themselves to one another in the presence of heaven, and every heart blessed them as they went their way rejoicing to their home.

Many years passed and again I saw those two. They were seated together where the light of a summer sunset stole through the half-closed crimson curtain, shedding a richer hue to the delicate carpeting and the exquisite embellishments of the rich and gorgeous apartment. Time had slightly changed them in outward appearance. The golden locks of the young wife had given place to the grace of perfect womanhood, and Fate in the form of years was slightly ploughing upon her still beautiful brow. Her husband's form was fuller, and his step not as elastic as in years might warrant. Anxiety, ambition and pride had gone over and left their impress upon his form and face. Silver was mingling with the darkness of his hair, which had become thinned around his temples almost to baldness. He was reclining on an ottoman with his head hidden in his hand, as if he feared that the deep and troubled thoughts which oppressed him were visible upon his features.

"Frank, you are ill to-night," said his wife in a low half inquiring voice, as she laid her hand his own.

Frank roused himself from his attitude slowly, and a slight frown knit his brow. "I am well," he said coldly and sternly, and he folded his arms upon his bosom, as if he wished no interruption of his evidently painful thoughts.

Indifference from those we love is terrible to a sensitive heart. It is a dreadful ordeal that the only being of our love refuses our sympathy, that he broods over feelings that he scorns, or fears to reveal, dreadful to behold the unclouded brow of a sorrow to which we are forbidden to participate, and where we are—we cannot know.

The wife attempted once more. "Frank," she said, slowly and affectionately, "Do you not know that I love you? Why do you turn from me in sorrow? Why do you not confide in me? Do I not share your joys and sorrows in our mutual home? Do I not share your joys and sorrows in our mutual home? Why, Frank, dear husband, is this cloud upon your brow? Why, husband, is this heaviness, but it passed away, and I shall be happy again?"

Time passed on, and Winsfred and Frank were separated from each other. The husband was gloomy and alone in the dampened chamber, and the wife was pale and sad as his good, and had mingled with many sorrows, yet he had sought out the brave and true friend, but you ought be a little fond of me, and not care less for her." he said.

Donagh flushed earlier all over his delicate face, started back, and stared apprehensively at her.

"You are very lovely and very attractive, Miss Mare," he began, at last.

"Mae! she repeated, arching her pretty brows impatiently.

"Mave," he corrected, softly, "I have the highest respect and affection for you. I don't know why you scorn me."

"I don't want respect, I am not old enough for that. I want you to like me as a boy. I like you; to look glad when you see me, and smile."

"But I am glad always to see you, dear Mave," he explained in pathetic gravity. "It would be a positive pain for me to come here, and not see you."

The door suddenly opened, and an old man stood on the threshold looking at them in a perplexed inquiry.

"I was accusing this bad boy for not coming to get for me an the letter, Donagh," Mave cried gleefully. "Tight I'm to have to pay."

"Hon away, kitten, and find some other bad boy to play with besides this lad's heart," and her father, smiling.

"She is a very charming child," Donagh remarked apologetically.

The old man glanced sharply at him, and nodded in silence. In the table before which they seated themselves was a three board with a large sheet of paper dotted and marked with lines in pen and ink.

"This movement of ours, last night, I see, after much study, was an incentive one. It left our weakest points exposed to the enemy's battery."

"How so? I should like to follow your study, Donagh said, leaning eagerly over the paper.

"I let work it out on the chess board. We'll say I am England, being the stronger. I have my pieces in advance, until Donagh said, "Ah, I see, I have left the king's bishop's pawn unprotected."

"Yes, she did, and so did England. Donagh conceded, dubiously. "And why, my Irish Ireland?"

"I am afraid that the feeling on the Continent for both countries is mark-ably different. "You'll see half for yourself by-by. By the way, did not we arrange you should start to-morrow night?"

Donagh assented.

"I have written letters for all the influential persons I know in Paris. Henry, I think, is a poor creature, but Chevarieux and Rochefort and the advanced party ought to be able to bring pressure to bear upon the Government. You are just the kind of emissary I have been seeking—gentle, well-mannered, and—"

"I will do my best, sir. If your influence can procure me an entrance to the Rue Mollaire, I promise to do my utmost to qualify myself specially for the future of a lighting man."

Pallette was it to see the light of enthusiastic conclusion in the face of the visionary old man reflected on the mobile countenance of the visionary boy, both from in their wild dreams and yearning towards the picture they had conjured up for admiration

THE WORK OF GOD.

The Editions of the Bible that were Printed before the Reformation.

No less than seventy editions of the entire Bible, or fifteen hundred of these editions, had been printed and published in the vernacular tongues before the dawn of the Reformation, and with the approbation of the Holy See. Of the Bibles in whose divines this work was done, and in one instance at least, so spoke in 1475, with the formal permission of the Supreme.

A full version in Latin was printed at Mentz in 1450 and in German twenty years before Luther's Bible appeared.

Latin versions of the entire Bible were also rapidly published as follows—at Hamburg in 1466, at Rome in 1471, at Lyons in 1477, at Venice and Naples in 1476, in Holland and Spanish 1477, in Bohemia in 1488, in Kaplend in 1505, in Ireland in 1531, in Poland in 1561, and in Roman in 1581.

The Italian version in Italian were published simultaneously at Rome and Venice in 1471—these passed through no less than thirteen different editions before 1825, and eight subsequent editions were printed during the last forty two years. These were all published with the express approbation of the Holy Office—they were full, complete, and faithful translations. Three other Italian versions, equally accurate, appeared at Venice in 1538, 1546, and 1641. The earliest complete version in German was printed at Augsburg in 1466, seventeen years before Luther was born; others followed so rapidly that there had been at least twenty different editions published in Germany before Luther's version was published.

Of the more famous of the elder German translations are those of Wittenberg, Nuremberg, Augsburg, Ulm, Strasburg—1470, Wittenburg and Nuremberg, 1483, Wittenburg, 1490, Lunbeck, 1494, and Halberstadt, 1522, Nuremberg, 1533-1552.

The first complete translation into French was that of Jean Morlins, published at Lyons and Paris in 1476, and it passed through seven editions, this was followed by the version of Lefevre, in 1530, and seventeen editions were then printed in 1573.

In the English language there were twenty-four editions before Tyndale's version in 1526, and printed in 1525. Our present English version is a translation from the Latin Vulgate, which was revised by the Douay Divines, and which St. Jerome, towards the close of the fourteenth century. It is to the best now known, and all the versions now extant.

The King James version, which is much the best, is not, however, perfect, defective, but blemish in gross inaccuracies of the original text in numbers of instances.

The Fatal Door.

The Chevalier Gerall de Hamps, was a very rich and proud man. Soon after the completion of his beautiful castle, he wished to marry a young lady of high birth and his great neighbors were invited to a grand feast. He had spared no expense of expense, his guests made speech after speech, which the host was proud to hear, and told that he was the most fortunate man in the world. The Chevalier Gerall de Hamps was so happy that he was proud and delighted he was.

He was among the guests, however, and nothing for a time. When each man had drunk his health, he said, "I have a little surprise to give you.

"And what thing is that?" demanded the Duke of Montmorency.

"One of your doors must be nailed up," replied the host.

At this reply, several of the guests began to laugh and friend Duke laughed as much as to say, "This man is mad." Gerall de Hamps, who was a little vain, was, he continued, "Not which door must be demanded.

"I must tell you through which you will one day be carried to your grave, replied the host.

These words struck both guests and host, and some of the guests left the feast early. The proud man remembered the vanity of his friends, and he was benefactor he no longer thought only of the beauty of his castle, but was gloomy and sad. He was completely altered and old, and he died a miserable death.

A Gradson of O'Connell.

But a few weeks since a child was born at a cottage of the Lakes, remarkable as being a grandson of the Liberator. The child, who is now living, would be in his 14th year. The father stranger is the son of Captain Daniel O'Connell, the oldest and only surviving son of the great Dan. Captain O'Connell died several years ago, but he was a gallant officer, and as far as a Roman Catholic can be, a loyal man. The mother, a Miss Cooper, is known in many a court round Europe as the well married and well married, and well married an English family. Two of his sisters yet survive, and reside in Ireland.

Two Famous Irishmen.

It is strange somewhere that the only two who were ever elected to represent three different nations in Congress were Irish, namely, General James Shields, the hero of three wars, who represented Illinois, Missouri and Minnesota, in the United States Senate, and Thomas Francis Meagher, who was, a few years ago, the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Congress of Montana. Shields was elected to Congress from Virginia, Illinois and Arkansas. Meagher was born in Tyrone. General Shields and Abraham Lincoln, also after the Mexican war, were rivals for the heart and hand of a young woman of Springfield, Illinois, Lincoln was the successful lover.

About Nodalities.

It was nothing more to find Catholics just the following sentence—"Are I not a Catholic? Have I not its consequences, all the rights, duties and privileges? Are I not, in the one of my joining the Sodality, Illinois Sodality, Mary, Queen of the Angels, Queen of Heaven, Queen of Hosts, Queen of Virgins, Queen of Martyrs, Queen of Confessors, Queen of Holy Virgins, Queen of Saints, Queen of Sodalities, Queen of Sodalities, Queen of Sodalities

THE MONITOR.

TWENTY-FOURTH YEAR OF PUBLICATION

The MONITOR has the largest circulation of any Religious Paper published on the Pacific Coast.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 4, 1888.

"IRELAND AND THE POPE."

SECOND ARTICLE.

A Brief History of Papal Intrigues against Irish Liberty from Adrian IV. to Leo XIII., By Liberty from Adrian IV. to Leo XIII., By James O. Maguire, Judge of the Superior Court of San Francisco, California. San Francisco: James H. Barry, 1888.

The corner-stone of the inflammatory indictment which the author of "Ireland and the Pope" brings against the successor of St. Peter, is the bogus Bull of Pope Adrian IV., which Judge Maguire accepts as true, and concerning which he coolly says:

"The subjugation of Ireland by English rule, as it well knows to all students of Irish history, was so accomplished by force of English arms, but by the decree and grant of Pope Adrian IV., engrossed in the Papal Bull of the decree and grant of Pope Adrian IV."

While, as I have said, these facts are well known to all students of Irish history, and while they are fully admitted by every Irish historian worthy of the name, careful readers have always kept the great lessons of Irish people in spite of, and, in that belief, not one out of ten hundred of the Irish people knew how their country had been sold. Not all of them are aware of the persistent efforts of the popes, from Adrian and Alexander to keep Ireland in its slavery to which their calculated bargain had delivered her."

Such is the dogmatic manner in which Judge Maguire decides the criminality of Popes, defines the crimes which they have committed, and renders a verdict of "guilty" in the harshest language which his Honor could invoke on the heads of innocent men whom—without producing a particle of evidence—he delivers over to the execration of every Catholic, for the "infamous bargain" they entered into!

Now it will be a most pleasing task on our part to point out the errors into which Judge Maguire has fallen in consequence of his Honor having read only one side of this historical question, and thus prejudicing the Popes and prejudicing the Irish people against them.

In the first place therefore, it is not true, and consequently it is not by any means "well-known to all students of Irish history" that Popes Adrian and Alexander bestowed and granted Ireland to Henry II. of England. No doubt Judge Maguire would like everybody to believe otherwise, but the weight of testimony—as we shall show further on—is greatly against him.

In the next place, Judge Maguire's "facts" (which he calls his ever-repeated assertions) are not "well known to all students of Irish history," nor are they "fully attested by every Irish historian worthy of the name." The charge against Popes Adrian and Alexander is at best what Father Tom Burke (God rest his soul!) used to say wishing to take the Irish view of the question, or too lazy to give the subject that scrutiny, which it deserves at their hands. Englishmen and Englishmen's descendants keep Ireland within her legal allegiance to Henry II. on the score of clothes. Unfortunately for the cause of Erin England had found even Catholics who were willing to be bribed into writing or were willing to be bribed into writing so-called "histories" which—like Scott's "Life of Napoleon," were written to order by the British Government in order to convince the world that England was right in every inequity she perpetrated against those whom she overdrove.

The very first man who—England hired to give currency to the lie—the idea that Pope Adrian IV. "the Infallible," "the Oracle of the age," "the most pious of Princes," when—as we shall show further on, it is well known that Henry was not only a mere immoral man, but he also caused the saintly Bishop Thomas a'Becket to be murdered in his own Cathedral!

It is really singular what unanimity exists between all enemies of the Church and the Popes concerning their fears regarding a spiritual something which they all designate by the attractive title of "clerical influence." Luther lamposoed it, Henry VIII., hated Adrian at it, Dr. McGlynn conured it, Henry George derided it, and now comes the Censurer-General of the Vicegerent of Christ—the dignified author of "Ireland and the Pope"—who declaims most violently against that ethereal hobgoblin conveniently called by critics of the Popes "clerical influence." The Judge of our Superior Court, unmistakably asserts that the Irish people are so disgustedly ignorant that not one in a hundred of them know anything of the "infamous bargain" of Popes Adrian and Alexander and their successors! This is a serious charge, but, fortunately, it is one of Henry George's flimsy fictions which his San Francisco disciple has copied from him. The Irish people are neither the ignorant dupes Judge Maguire depicts them, nor are they foolish enough to accept the frantic fanaticism of a freshly freshened for the truth of history. Centuries before the Superior Court of San Francisco had a Chief Censurer-General of the Popes within its bailiwick, the Irish people knew far better than Judge Maguire can now tell them, the whole history of their land as it was handed down through tradition from parent to child. And the descendants of this grand old Irish stock, who live in the present day, have no occasion to sit at the feet of any Georgite Gamaliel in order to learn the history of the land of their birth.

Where and from whom did old Rita shout of "clerical influence" assume a shape and became materialized? Assuredly not in Home or from the Popes, seeing not of them ever examined the slightest curvature influence over the education of the Irish people. Was it from the Irish Bishops? Decidedly not! No body of Prelates in the Universal Church of Christ ever did more to foster and to propagate among their people a knowledge of the history of their native land, than did the Bishops of Ireland. In the face of the fierce Penal Code that ever disgraced the statute books of any country, the Irish Bishops had the history of Ireland taught to Catholic children in the shadows of the sweet hawthorne hedges of Ireland because it was imprisonment and exile to both teach and pupil if British spies discovered a Catholic school in Erin! Is it from the Bishops who sent their ecclesiastical students to Rome, Louvain, Paris and other cities in Continental Europe, to be thoroughly educated in Irish literature and Irish history that Judge Maguire would lead their theirs both along the narrow path of true Faith, and also through the lines of legitimate agitation by which they could—and will eventually—secure the liberty of their native land.

Comparatively speaking it is only a few years since Catholic Emancipation was granted and the legal shackles of coercion of conscience unloosed from Priest and patriot in Ireland. Yet within a great galaxy of scholars, historians, orators, statesmen, poets and theologians the Catholic body in Ireland has produced since then! The mythical "clerical influence" of Judge Maguire did not certainly use what his Honor would call its "infamous bargain" in repressing the poetical, musical, oratorical or historical genius of Ireland! No country in the world has more of its history embodied in its music and poetry than Ireland, and even the boys and girls of Ireland, as they whistle and lilt the martial air and words of "Let Erin Remember the Days of Old," could give Judge Maguire a lesson in Irish history which would actually alarm the Judge of the Superior Court of San Francisco in his own peculiar "ignorance" and at the surprising knowledge possessed by even the peasons and noblesse of old Grattan's!

To her glory be it said, the great majority of Ireland's best and brightest men were educated under the Rule of the Catholic Church, and beneath the very canopy of that "clerical influence" which Judge Maguire so mistakingly and yet so maliciously depicts as exercising its prerogative to keep the people of Ireland in ignorance of the history of a land whose political persecution came through the prerogative legislation leveled at the Church herself! To keep the Irish people in ignorance of the history of their country, therefore, would be to enslave them from the minds the history of the martyrs who died for the Catholic faith, the Confessors who proclaimed it, and the persecuted people who suffered for it! Even as recent an enemy of the Pope as the Judge of the Supreme Court of San Francisco, will be forced to admit that no "clerical influence" whatever, in the Catholic Church, would be stupidly stultify itself as to commit such a suicidal blunder as that!

The truth is that the history of Ireland has been told by Catholic Bishops and Priests to their people from the pulpits of Irish churches, in lectures and sermons, from time immemorial, especially during the long night of English bondage, when, in the eyes of the enemies of suffering Erin,

"It was treason to love her
And death to defend her!"

The Shamrock, growing from the altar steps, Liffey and the Lee; in the cabin of the peasant and beside the sweet-smelling fire of the Sagarth Aroon, the sad history of Ireland's sufferings has been reiterated time and again, until even the women and children of that country represented every fact of Erin of that country represented every fact of Erin of that country represented every fact of Erin

Farm and Home.

Useful Hints for the Lady of the House.

WOMAN'S SPHERE.

The family, the home, the school, the church, the work, are factors of our domestic system which make up the interests of life, and the period at the more nearly meet the demands of these institutions are the years of woman. To woman in largely confided the care of the first three of these factors, and her concurrence influence is shown in their management no more potent way than in the choice of literature she permits in them. All that ennobles, that strengthens, that uplifts and expands the mind and spiritual, equally with the intellectual nature is sought for by her. Whatever is sanctioned by the mother, the wife and the sister, is the best for the nation, and the glory and the hope of this country is founded to the vindication of this fact.

DRINKS FOR THE DOG DAYS.

The hot season is upon us, and people are apt to be dry.

Lemonade is a satisfying drink, especially without sugar; half a lemon to a tumbler of water.

Hot beer is wholesome if made of the right kind of roots.

A stronger potable is ginger pop, which may be purchased advantageously at stores.

Cold, mild tea is pleasant to the palate, and may be slightly sugared with advantage.

A bowl of cold bouillon is "both food and drink, sir," as a famous lawyer says.

Some men enjoy cider, hard or sweet.

In Philadelphia a favorite tipple is mead, which is said to be the embrace of that scientific city, and very stimulating to the Philadelphia intellect.

In short, there are many pleasant and wholesome draughts to be enjoyed by the thirsty soul in hot weather.

HOUSEHOLD RECIPES.

Flannel, grown yellow by repeated washing, will whiten wonderfully if left out doors over night.

To cleanse chamois skin, rub into it plenty of soft soap, let it lie in a warm solution for two hours, rub clean, and rinse in warm water in which soda and hard soap have been dissolved.

The tendency of a starch to adhere to the iron may be avoided by putting kerosene or spermaceti into it. A bit of white soap dissolved in the water used to prepare the cold starch cloth week will have the same effect.

One who has tried several ways to wash bed blankets says that the best thing is not to wring them after the last rinsing, but to hang them on the line and let them drip dry. The nap is then not matted down and the blanket retains its beauty and soft appearance.

Boiling water will usually take out berry stains; if not, use a little chloride of lime in the water. For raspberry stains there is nothing better than a weak solution of ammonia. Washing with alcohol, or wetting the spots and rubbing with soap and soda, will take out grass stains. Ink discoloration in white goods will commonly disappear when pounded salts of lemon are placed on the stains and they are placed in the hot sun for fifteen minutes.

The Habitual Drunkard

The Westminster Review contains an Habitual Drunkard. Drunkenness is one of the terrible struggle by which stems the pessimistic sun hope to escape from this world and intellectual thraldom into which moral and material advancement, each potent contributing in unconscious failure. By a strenuous exertion of the will, aided by careful avoidance of temptation, he found that the craving for drink could be kept under for a time; but although each day of abstinence rendered the ordeal less intense, a single taste of alcohol was enough to bring back the longing in all its strength. He lays special stress upon the fact that if the habit of over-indulgence has once taken firm hold, all attempts to break away by gradual steps are utterly futile. Temperance is, in fact, the only cure for the habitual drunkard. Dipsomania is, no doubt, a disease owing indeed by drink; but, according to this writer, it can certainly be cured by total abstinence sufficiently long maintained. The difficulty is to keep clear of that which satisfies and stimulates the insane passion; and this can only possibly be accomplished by enforced seclusion.

Tobacco for a Baby Horse.

Quite a crowd of boys and men stopped the other day to watch a baby horse, "hit him with a club," said one. "Try moral suasion on him," was the voice of another. "Whisper oats in his ear and he will go," remarked a third. The owner blabbered the animal with his whip, jerked on the bits, and then tried to coax the refractory beast but all to no purpose; the beast refused to move. A quarter of an hour later a little old man, whose face resembled parchmen, approached the group, and taking drawing the owner of the immovable piece of horseflesh said: "If I may talked?" "Yes," replied the disconsolate owner. "Can's make him budge an inch?" "Not an inch." "Tried everything?" "Everything I know of." "Tried Tobacco?" "No; I never heard of that remedy." The little old man took a plug of the weed from his pocket, cut off a generous piece and offered it to the horse. The animal accepted the meal and instantly forgetting his aplomb, walked off without as much as a suggestion from his owner.

Cutting Short Neuralgic Pains.

In those who are disposed to neuralgic, attacks of pain are frequently brought on by fatigue or so-noted exercise. Journal of Health advises those people to live very regularly and to observe this rule of eating: When the pain comes on in consequence of waiting too long for a meal, a cup of hot drink, such as milk, cocoa, or beef tea, will very often stop it.

Treatment of a Fainting Fit.

The common practice of lifting fainting people in an upright or sitting position is sufficient to destroy the spark of life that remains. Medical authority has recently emphasized the fact that such persons must be kept in the prone position while restoratives and local means are employed to return them to consciousness.

Cream as a Medicine.

As an antidote for a consumptive tendency it is claimed that cream acts like a charm, and serves all the purposes intended to be served by cod liver oil, with much greater certainty and effect. Besides persons non-consumptively inclined, those with feeble digestion, aged people and those inclined to shiftiness and acid extremities are especially benefitted by a liberal use of sweet cream.

— The friends of Ireland in Philadelphia are practical patriots. On the 11th inst. they held a mass meeting and subscribed $6,500 in a few hours. Is the same dead in San Francisco?

Family Fun.

A Boy's Composition on Girls.

Girls are very stuck up and dignified in their manner and behavior. They think more of themselves than anything, and like to play with dolls and rags. They cry if they see a cow or a mile away and afraid of guns. They stay at home all the time and go to church on Sundays. They if scream and holler like crazy if they see a mouse and they're always sick. They can't play marbles and they're always making fun of boys handsaw they say they don't play fair in your things. They make fun of boys and then turn round and love them. I don't believe they ever killed a cat or anything. This is one thing I have not told and that is they always know their lessons better than boys.

Thought She Knew the Words.

"What are you reading, John?" inquired Mrs. Blankenship of her husband as she looked up from her mending and saw him, book in hand, stretched at full length upon the sofa.

"Hit in the Song of the Shirt."

"The song of the shirt!"

"Yes, you know how the tunegoes, don't you?" he said in an attempt to be witty.

"No, John," she replied gently. "I can't say that I know how the tune goes, but I should imagine that the words are something like 'Sentimental M. Marra, this dad longed button hole has been ripped out of the dog gasted wristband for the last three weeks.'"

A Heart-Breaking Discovery.

Anxious Father—Why, what's the matter? Little Son—Me and Dick was playin' we was Abe Lincoln and splittin' rails, an' we got that big board all chopped up nuuuuu cases and and took it in for kindlin.

"But you didn't want the wood, did you?"

"N-no."

"Then what were you crying for?

"I've just found out I—I won't been playing. I've been chopping—boo—hoo."

His Wife Got Left.

Robinson—So you are going to Europe, Brown?

Brown—Yes, for a couple of months. I have been very sick lately, and I think the trip will do me good.

Robinson—I hope so. Mrs. Brown will accompany you, of course.

Brown—S-so; my wife has complained of not feeling very strong recently, and I'm afraid to have her undertake the trip.

He'd Better Look Out.

Wife—You shouldn't take such a morbid view of life, my dear. Look at poor Mr. Smith, with his small income and his wife slowly dying, and yet he has a cheerful smile and a pleasant word for everybody.

Husband—Is his wife dying!

Wife—Yes.

Husband—And he is cheerful and pleasant!

Wife—Yes.

Husband—Well, if he doesn't look out he'll give himself away.

No Foreign Plummery for Him.

A tall old man with a rather vacant look and a hesitating air, ventured slowly into the dining hall of a large up town hotel in mental dinner hour. Another man, who was evidently in the habit of dining there, recognized him and seemed to be a helpless fellow, so he quickly crossed the room, hastened up, and the old man said:

"Waiter, do I look right, tidy, you know?"

"The waiter inspected the venerable guest critically for a moment, and then assured him all was in order.

"Necktie all right?"

"Yes, sir.

"Collar button show?

"Not at all, sir.

"No spots on my coat?

"Not a spot."

"The general effect is pretty slick, is it?"

"Very, sir."

"Well, you see, waiter," said the old man confidentially, "I came down to breakfast one day last week without any collar, and made my son James very angry; and so yesterday when I came into lunch with my necktie undone my left ear, he said if anything like that happened again he would have my mouth sewed spatula. Do you know my son James, waiter?"

"Yes, sir."

"Is he here at dinner, now?"

"No, sir, he finished about ten minutes ago."

"Are you sure?"

"Perfectly, sir."

"Well, then, waiter," said the old man in relieved tones, "if you are certain of it, you tell the man at our table to bring in the some corned beef and cabbage, and not to play any of his French business on me, or I'll break his neck."

"I can never be more than a sister to you," said a brazen widow, tenderly, to a bachelor who had proposed.

"Ah, madam, you you can," he responded pathetically. "Not an inch."

"Yes, but I cannot," she persisted.

"You have daughters, madame," he said, "you may yet be my mother-in-law."

He—Do you know, Miss Mabel, I have discovered why my brain is so active.

She—No, Mr. Minnewit. What is your theory?

It is because I so often start a train of thought."

"Ah, p-s—the "limited."

A CASTIGATION FOR CASWELL.

A Good Rousting for a Los Angeles Kanaka—A Wesleyan Calumniator Cleverly Counterdicted.

LOS ANGELES, June 27, 1888.

EDITOR OF THE MONITOR:

Dear Sir—In the Tribune of this city there recently appeared a pretended sermon delivered by a Methodist preacher named Caswell, on Martin Luther. Mr. Caswell has a perfect right to think whatever he pleases about Luther, but he has no right to utter false and lost slander and calumny against 200,000,000 of Christians, and we think that the journal that prints a full report of the mendacious lecture (to be sensitive) should publish a reply to the abominable charges therein contained. Some of the charges are published in the Tribune, and have hurried in order to briefly review them.

Tetzel, preaching and selling indulgences in Germany to raise money to rebuild St. Paul's Cathedral, first accuse the man in Leather. Listen to "indulgences for the sins of Luther's sins." "Indulgences for the most precious and million gifts of God. This red cross has as much efficacy as the cross of Jesus Christ.

"There is no sin so great that the indulgence cannot remit it. Your loved ones are crying from the bottomless pit. If you have only one cent, you ought to strip it of to purchase their deliverance."

The pope charged for committing the sin of perjury, six dollars; perjury, nine; murder, eight; and witchcraft two. Luther revolted against this horrible iniquity, and uttered one of the imperishable sentences "Tetzel selling, I will make a hole in Tetzel's drum."

That Luther was not called upon to raise money, was the sole cause which prompted him to fabricate the abominable lie of the sale of indulgences. Like the first arch-rebel that was cast down from Heaven, he lost all his energies in utility to the cause of Christ. The literature of the Church is open to the scholars of the world; any one desiring to investigate Catholic doctrine can easily learn what has been teach in the Catholic Church since the days of St. Peter. Educated Protestants know that Catholics do not believe the doctrines attributed to them by Luther. The idea is too absurd, but I presume some ministers are like a great many politicians, who consider that what is often repeated will assume a false prestige as well as truth. I once met a Methodist preacher named Fly, in the State of Tennessee, who was industriously circulating, not the Bible, but a work entitled "The Chosen Vessel." I was looking it over if he proved that the virtue of the deity diatribe was ashamed to sign his name to it, yet the man that pretended to be preaching the Gospel of Christ, was not ashamed to circulate it among a people who had no opportunity to investigate its truth or falsehood. Within the space of thirty years hundreds of the most learned ministers of the Church of England embraced the Catholic religion, not to speak of such men as Cardinals Manning and Newman, Lord Vincent Phillipp, and the Earl of Ripon. Hundreds of distinguished Protestants of America, also became converts to the True Church, among them the scholarly Dr. Brownson, Bishop Ives of North Carolina, the Church's and Brothers' of New York and Rosecrans of Ohio. I would like to ask Mr. Caswell if the distinguished gentlemen here enumerated, would join a church that sold a license to commit the most heinous of crimes? If Mr. Caswell would but read the "Trials of a Mind," written by Bishop Ives, he would have an insight into true Christianity.

Speaking of the Reformation, Mr. Caswell said:

The world had witnessed no grander scene of moral heroism since Christ stood before Pilate or Paul before Nero.

What vast interests were trembling in the balance. The freedom of the press, of conscience, of the Bible, human liberty everywhere; the right of private judgment, of an open Bible, all hung upon the decision of that momentous hour.

The right of private judgment and of an open Bible was not conceded to the followers of the apostles, to the followers of the Apostles, St. Peter, talks as in his First Epistle, "There is no prophecy of Scripture of private interpretation." Peter is a Roman Epistle, speaking of the writings of St Paul, he says, "There are things hard to be understood," as there are other portions of the Scriptures, which also pervert.

Caswell proceeds in praising Luther for giving all he followers the right of private judgment of the Scriptures, closely demonstrate that the new religion is not Apostolic. Peter's words are clear and unequivocal. Luther's private interpretation has borne fruit in the creation of three hundred different sects, all claiming their inspiration from the Bible, but all differing with regard to the meaning thereof.

Now Mr. Caswell, preach your peculiar doctrine as long as you please, a whipping some indeed, it is your privilege, only remember the Eighth Commandment, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor."

Speaking of Luther, Mr. Caswell said:

He was a brilliant, intellectual light. He published 175 volumes of books and pamphlets, making one for every two weeks of his entire life. These works were widely diversified. His songs were as potent in the hands of the reformation as were Charles Wesley's in the England.

He has made many books and sermons I will not undertake to deny. A stanza of one of his poems and as follows:

"He shot lewn not wine, woman and song,
Luther and all his life long."

He wrote a Latin work Damnes Primum, in which he says, "If we send thieves to the gallows and murderers to the block, why not to these miscreants, the Priests, without the review of their sentence? Why not shoot these Pilate or Paul before Nero, was there ever such language used by any man calling himself a Christian, one who loved God? Yet he was hailed as a Reformer!

Thus the doctrine spread rapidly in Germany and England, we have painful evidence. In the city of London there are over fifty conventions of sensual iniquity. According to a newspaper dispatch of Leslie's Magazine, out of 60,000 females in the city of Berlin, 30,000 corpses were consigned to earth without any religious rite or ceremony. A homily on the fall of idolatry from the pen of the brilliant and intellectual light," ends as follows:

"Before the Reformation all sects and degrees of men, women and children of whole Christendom were at one devoted in abundant fidelity, and that for the space of 800 years and Latin.

In the Twenty-eighth Chapter of St. Matty, verses 18 and 20, we read: At that time, Jesus said to His Disciples: "All power is given to Me in heaven and on earth; going, therefore, teach all nations, baptising them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you, and behold I am with you all days even to the consummation of the world."

Now Mr. Caswell, who shall we believe, Christ or Luther?

As for falling on the Priests without the order of the ministerial, England obeyed that command to the letter, and hailed as Christ, who lived and died a Protestant, wrote:

"They lofted the Cross they lofted the sun
To kill the Christ who died on it
Their dogs were made alike to run
Upon the scent of well and Paul."

Behold the contrast between Protestant and Catholic, from their history, Protestant England, Italy, the United States and Mexico; the one skill, progress; on the other, decay.

Luther consulted the fountains of human freedom—emancipated the sentient conscience and placed humanity upon the throne of human independence, higher than the Priesty and made possible the Republic of the world.

Now comes the most startling of all historical discoveries. "Luther made possible the Republic of the world." The Republic of this Martin, the man who was a bigoted Pope 700 years before Luther was born, and he a Republic still. Lying adjacent to the Papal States, it could have been wiped out in forty eight hours. Luther's counterpoise, the Hussites, helped the English serfs the Indians to scalp American women and children, by way of establishing a Republic in this New World, we presume. It was to help the young Republic that John Wesley went on bended knees to George Third to beg of him to send him (Wesley) at the head of an army to pull down the American rebels.

"Of course where is thy blush." Not knowing the birthplace of the Rev. Caswell, I infer he is not an American, for if he were he would be ashamed of the intelligence of the American people by such a falsification of facts.

The pilgrims that came over in the Mayflower and Oliver Cromwell, he extols as model Christians. The former excused themselves for burning the Hussites, calling fire cure of Huss, Jerome, and burning the witches, while the latter spared neither age nor sex in Ireland.

In one day Cromwell put to death 1500 men, women and children in the market-square of Wexford. His troopers would throw infants of Catholic parents up in the air and catch them on their bayonets coming down! Yet we are told by some writers, that said Christian soldiers carried an open Bible in their pocket. The above are well authenticated facts of history Mr. Caswell.

You challenge a comparison between France and England. France helped to establish our glorious Republic, while England trampled on freedom the world over. Marshal Lafayette equipped a regiment out of his private fortune to make a Republic possible, while England was strangling the Irish for asserting the right to live in their own country. England in Ireland reduced the population of Ireland nearly four millions by starvation and expatriation. Her laws gave the usurpers power to sell for rent the crops raised on the estates confiscated from their forefathers, or Wendell Phillips said, "to spend on the dancing girls of Paris, but more recently to be spent in buying children for the slave traders, as was proven by Editor Stead," of the Pall Mall Gazette. Look at cland, today, Mr. Caswell, and you will see the England Prime Minister arresting and impressing Priests for doing what they chose to chose against the most cruelty tyranny, and in favor of freedom.

If you should be called to labor in the Lord's vineyard in Utah, you will find many former disciples of Wesley from Norway, Sweden and Wales, who are not well versed in history, and who may be edified by your learned lectures on oratory and rare historical gems.

On September 21, 1520, the Pope issued the Papal Bull excommunicating Luther, in which the Pope reiterates, "All his writings are to be burned and he is to be brought to Rome and burned at the stake."

The Pope issuing a Bull to have Luther burned at the stake will startle the students of history more than Donnelly's discovery of the author of the plays attributed to Shakespeare. The United States is not a company and we pay Mr. Caswell, if you are not called to Utah, follow Stanley's Central Africa.

He is charged with being almost blasphemous in some of his writings, and it is not to be wondered at.

Had the privileges of reasoning one of his works pertain in 1561, and owned by the American Tract Society, valued at $1000, it, outshone many comic songs armed largely at the Pope.

In this way, "Writings are the sermons of the Honorable Herr Doctor Martin Luther," printed in Dublin, and prefaced illustrated by Lord Cloncurry, authenticating Romanism.

The American Tract Society must possess many ancient Christian virtues, and they seem to appreciate native art, when they set the price of their highly artistic picture of Pope and Cardinal Hall and other Popes with outstretched arms to receive them at death. The Rev. Mr. Caswell had the rare privilege of seeing this Christian work of art, Raphael or Michael Angelo never conceived anything so sacred as that. When Mr. Caswell was manoeuvring his many amiable acts of humanity, he was consulted telling us how many decade the Landgrave of Hesse gave him (Luther) for permission to keep two wives at the same time, and did he tell us of the souvenirs in the

CATHOLIC SCHOOL EXHIBITIONS.

ST. MARY'S SCHOOL, VIRGINIA CITY, NEVADA.

The closing exercises by the people of St. Mary's School, Virginia City, Nevada, under the supervision of the Sisters of Charity, took place at Stimpfig Hall, on the afternoon of Thursday last, the 28th inst. The speakers hall was crowded to its utmost capacity with the parents of the pupils, permanent residents and people of the localities who were delighted by the talents and training of the children. The senior classes of young ladies acitted it cream-colored costumes were seated on archeated thrs which were placed on the stage and presented a picture of matchless grace and beauty. After the opening address by Master Frank Stimpfig, the following programme, which their students faithfully carried out to the delectation, appreciation and pleasure of their fond parents:

Senior Class—Maude McDermott, Louisa Dunn, Mary Walsh, Magdie Connihan, Mary Neale, Magdie Tierney, Josiphn Martin, Kate Ryan, Angie McDermott, Annie Kanan, Sarah Ryan.

Harp Department—Master Ed. Neale.

In testimony of their proficiency in their studies and skillful department, Misses Nellie Wren and Josephine Tracy were awarded gold medals.

Such instructional part of the programme was of very high order of excellence. The dialogue, entitled "Liberty and her Handmaids," was exhibitably rendered, and elicited much praise. The young ladies who represented the Liberty and Her Handmaids, who performed her difficult part to perfection. The shiny young ladies who participate were faultless. The singing of the "Star Spangled Banner" by the entire school was highly imposing.

After the exercises an address was delivered by the Rev. Father Tuliman, who complimented the people on their marked success in the system set in the manner in which the exercises were conducted, and the progress made by the pupils. He said they should be proud of their talented children, and hoped the people would thoroughly enjoy their vacation, so that the St. Mary's School pupils resume their studies on September 3, and they will do so with renewed health and energy for another year's mental culture.

SACRED HEART ACADEMY, OGDEN CITY

The closing exercises of the Sacred Heart Academy showed that this excellent institution has not deserved the prestige and confidence it has been bestowed upon it during the past ten years. The Prof. Lyman Wood, Commissioner of Schools as well as at the public examination which preceded the closing exercises displayed a degree of proficiency which could not be easily excelled. Every pupil engaged in the exercises of the academy was thoroughly grounded in all the branches, and was needed to make a success in life, and whose sweet training is a sufficient guarantee that the young ladies who graduated from the Sacred Heart Academy were well versed in the duties of the Academy were Misses Lizzie Doyle, Maggie Hogan, Mamie and Rosa Fitz-Gerald. An excellent programme was beautifully rendered.

The programme was rendered without a break which to some extent effect which it produced up on the large assemblage of friends and patrons who attended the exercises. At the conclusion a number of gold medals, the gifts of Right Reverend Bishop Lenihan, the patron of the place, Rev. Father Gallivan and Nuttel, Dr. Allen Fowler and others were distributed, were presented to the young ladies who happened to be the charming recipients of the medals, which were given for excellence. The following young ladies drew prizes in the different studies. In Christian Doctrine—Rosa Anna Newell, Virginia City, Montana.—Application in studies—Miss Eliza Ryan, Virginia City, Montana—In the Minor Class—Nora Scudder, Corinne.—In improvement in Instrumental music—Miss Mary Cunnion, Salt Lake City.

Junior Department—Ida Cosgrove, Ogden.—In improvement in Vocal Music Miss Mary Alexander, Hally, Idaho. The gold medal in plating was presented to Miss Emma Colby, Salt Lake City, Utah, and the silver medal to Miss Mary Alexander, Hally, Idaho. In improvement in instrumental music—Miss Ellen Hanna, Salt Lake and Miss Sarah Mulmer, Ogden City, Utah. In improvement in Vocal Music, Miss Catherine Peters, South Butte Montana. For plain sewing and domestic economy Miss Catherine Ryan, Boulder, Montana. For Christian work of art, Raphael or Michael Angelo never conceived anything so sacred as that. When Mr. Caswell was manoeuvring his many amiable acts of humanity, he was consulted telling us how many decade the Landgrave of Hesse gave him (Luther) for permission to keep two wives at the same time, and did he tell us of the souvenirs in the

The death is announced on June 8th, of Michael McCabe, C. C. St. Peter's, Belfast, Deceased, who was a native of Crossmolina, county Clare, born in 1848, and received his education in St. Patrick's College, Carlow, and in Patrick's College, Carlow. He was ordained in Belfast 1876.

Armagh

The venerable and much esteemed parish priest of Tynan, the Very Rev. John Canon Quinn, died in his residence, Middleton, the 6th of June, aged 64 years. He was ordained in 1850, and spent his entire sacerdotal life in the parish of Tynan. Have he found himself driven to make a close for his poor people, who had no income, and he succeeded, by a letter in the Freeman's Journal and Dundalk Democrat of that day (1859) the action of a local landlord, Mr. James Armstrong, who had rented 32 families, for clearing purposes, although all of the tenants had paid every penny of rent due. For this he was tried at the Armagh Assizes, in 1860, for criminal libel, and acquitted though there was only one Catholic on the jury. He became parish priest in 1869. Father Quinn's death is greatly regretted by all classes.

Cork.

Wonderful progress has been made in the construction of the Kenmare and Westport railway. All the rails and sleepers are on the ground and by the week of Ivyleg, said the memory of the station houses is all but complete.

Clare.

On June 9th, Mr. James Halpin, P. L. G., of Ennis, married Miss Kate Ryan, the daughter of Michael McMahon and Patrick Canny, resident of Newmarket-on-Fergus, were married by a strong police escort to Limerick, and lodged in the Limerick Jail. The prisoners were charged with conspiracy to prevent the execution of the decree of Mr. J. R. Cox, M. P. The prisoners were released on bail, but passed on him under the Crewdle Act, Mr. Halpin and his bride were lodged in the Limerick Jail. Mr. Halpin is the Mayor of Ennis, was nominated as a candidate for the Mayoralty, but refused to accept the proper person to represent South Sligo, and refused to accept the house in aid of St. Mary's Hospital, Armagh.

Cavan

Another vacancy is about to occur in an Irish bishopric, Mr. O'Donnell, P. P. Killeshandra, resigns in Cavan, having sent in his resignation, for business purposes.

Down.

On June 6th, Mr. Laurence McGuart, P. L. G., Shrowbridge, was released from Armagh Jail, after undergoing a month's imprisonment under the Coercion Act. Mr. McGuart was sent at the Shrowbridge station by the Shrowbridge Brass and Reed Band, which numbered a number of gold medals, the gifts of Right Reverend Bishop Leahy, the patron of the place, Rev. Patrick Gallivan and Nuttel, Dr. Allen Fowler and others were distributed, were presented to the young ladies who happened to be the charming recipients of the medals, which were given for excellence. The following young ladies drew prizes in the different studies. PEARLS IN IRELAND.

When talking to a gentleman from Omagh, recently I asked him how is the Lough—meaning the Lough of Omagh. He said, "Lough! Lough! Why that had been long in the front when annoyed of county Tyrone. One was over a foot—a inch in diameter, and second in the quality, while a score of others ranged downward to the size of small pin-shot. My informant, who is Chairman of the Town Commissioners, is of opinion that a twelve months growth of the mussels, which are in great abundance, and that a careful search might prove of immense benefit to the district.

The Irish Exodus.

During the past few weeks no less than twenty-one and women in their prime of life have been shipped from the Westport district of Clare in emigrant ships—in fact the steamers leaving Kilrush, Kilkee and Limerick were crowded with emigrants for America and the Colonies. For many years there has not been such a flow of emigrants from West Clare as up to the present of this season. In one township no less than thirty men and women left in one day and it is nearly the same all over the district.

LOWER YOUR HEAD AND GOD WILL RAISE IT.

In my childhood is a memory
Of a word my mother said,
When some modest school boy triumphs,
For a moment turned my head;
And its wisdom is repeated
To whoever rightly weighs it,
Heaven helps the such and humble—
Lower your head and God will raise it.

And since childhood's days have left me,
Since I've found the world and men,
That sweet, simple Irish maxim
Often has recurred again;
For Humility (proud virtue,
Though we seldom find one praise it.)
Is the sweet of distinction—
Lower your head and God will raise it.

He will never win a battle
Who is he-fine of debate,
And his plans will fall topsyturvy,
Who counsel not them of council;
Though talent plays a lot in efforts,
Modest talent never says it.

For he guards him by his maxim
Lower your head and God will raise it.

In the constant strife around us,
Selon plays a moral part,
Through the battle of Pride he enters,
Safely to the human heart;
And he fills it with delusions,
And he finally betrays it;
Let the humble on my moral—
Lower your head and God will raise it.

A STUDENT'S SONG—FAREWELL.

The Spring has come, and clad sweet Erin's Creek
With richer green and flowers,
And Phoebus bright, dids the each day more
With very happy hours.

It wakes the merry tuneful birds with song,
On every blossoming spray,
Where mates will not come among the hills
Until the close of day.

So, ah! also for me who soon will bid,
At death of cheerful Spring,
Our dear, and ok, home-endine and fareweel,
To many a charming thing.

And far from friends and parents, sister dear,
In other lands I'll sleep,
And shall no more beneath paternal walls,
Lend hear the distant deep.

But, ah! my faith'ing and is raised in prayer,
To fellow God's sweet call—
To give my heart alike to all mankind,
While sense of life shall fall.

But still within my breast, dear Lelah Creek,
Dues over shall you dwell,
For would your pure romantic banks I've played
Until night's wings sufficient.

Then beneath the bright unclouded moon,
Oh, happy would I stroll,
And with my brothers hear a broken song
With pains compressed soul.

Now to my Alma Mater do I goo
With fond and streaming eyes,
And when the next returning Spring shall come
To ask the happy year,—

Oh! let them all within their bosom's core,
Remember me alway,
For in my prayers, I'll ever ask I fondly met
A thought to this dear day.

MOTHER OF SORROWS.

On Calvary's grey hill-top,
The Virgin-Mother stood,
Sharing her Son's one anguish
As He hung upon the Rood.

On sign, no tone, betrayed
The Mother's aching woe,
The heart was well-nigh broken
As she saw Him Blk-blood flow.

Ah, who could paint her sorrow,
As He bowed His chem-crowned head;
And from its lacerated pillow,
His troubled spirit fled.

Oh! Mary, Queen of Martyrs!
By the pains and griefs you felt,
Help daily human souls
Lead a life of holy faith.

Make us partakers in the sorrows,
Make us adopt Catholic country like you
Till we find in blissful Eden,
Joy and pleasure unalloyed.

A fair child found a diamond in the mude,
And here it, sparkling, put a dear where she
A woman could, with long, white, proud hands
Which a thousand times very nobly, had stood
She sugar crisp! then, still more eager, prayed,
"Lower this with may go, search, and others above
And when then hunt enough, there shall be made
A chapelet for thee fit for my queen!"

The gathered one believed. Where those like

The glitting sands, she, remolent, sought and found
The precious gems, which, at the twilight said,
The woman in a silver casket bound.

A peasant chapelet! As she brought the last, Lo! the Queen, smiling, said, "The task is satisfied;
But, on this chapelet, while, with eyes upcast,
Her cheeks, like rosy tapers, flick'ring flamed—

The woman smote a dagger in her side,
And wept her way—the diamonds in her hair;
And all who saw her pain, shuddrice, sighed,
"How will the queen bestow a fate so fair!"

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.]

CHAPTER III.

Donagh sat down to a hurried dinner, but wonder and distress left him no appetite. He could only vaguely conjecture the motive of this annual tyranny. He felt sorely tempted to rebel against it, but he did not see how a serious scene with his father would improve his position, and, after all, it was only anticipating his departure from Dublin by a day.

Still he would greatly have liked to bid pretty mary Mave "good-bye" before what might prove a long absence, and he felt some parting instructions from Mave's father would have been an additional comfort to him.

Apparently Mr. Fitzgerald's business did not lie in London, for scarcely had they reached that city, than he announced his intention of proceeding at once to Paris.

Donagh began to app.ehend magic, though it was impossible that his father should have discovered his mission. In Paris, he was not allowed one instant's solitude. If he wanted to write a letter, his father sat near him and read indiscreet conversation even grew upon him that his correspondence was mysteriously watched.

He chafed and fretted in this domestic bondage. It was not his fault if his spirits were diametrically opposed to those of his father, and he felt a hard thrill pg pa'ns that since they disagreed so should he treated as a fractious and irrepressible child. His nervous irritability became so marked that, on the second day of their stay in Paris, Mr. Fitzgerald said at breakfast:

"Now, look here, Donagh, you are best on making a fool of yourself, and I am equally bent upon preventing you. I am stronger than you, and I will succeed. Struggling will do no good; it will only wear out your nervous system.

"I don't understand you," Donagh cried testily.

"Yes, you do. I know more of your movements than you imagine. You've got yourself mixed up lately with a very dangerous and foolish old firebrand—a man of the past, who believes in the possibility of a war or a revolution, or the dear knows what. He has made you, if anything, madder than himself. If pressed, remember, my dear boy, I am prepared to use the very strong, not measures to restrain you from injuring yourself and your family. But I hope you will be reasonable and accede to my terms.

"What terms!"

"I offer you perfect liberty on condition you remain away from Ireland for a year. Travel about—go to the East—anywhere, you will have a reasonably filled purse."

Donagh reflected. Travelling about, other scenes would certainly offer him opportunities for sounding the extent of sympathy Ireland could be sure of abroad.

"I accept, father," he said at length, not with the hope you have in view—but, by modifying my intentions or separations, but I will learn some enlightenment way of serving my cause in other lands. There is a question of the Greeks I would like to thoroughly understand it from the Hellenic point of view.

JUDGE MAGUIRE'S MANY MISTAKES.

THIRD ARTICLE.

The fraudulent motives which prompted the hireling Giraldus Cambrensis to accede to the request of King Henry II. of England, which the Abbé McGeoghegan so lucidly exposes, have also drawn down upon the head of that disputable Welshman the just indignation of numerous other Irish historical writers.

Assuredly Judge Maguire could not have known the true character of Giraldus Cambrensis, or he would never have cited that pensioned libeller of the Irish people as a witness in the authenticity of the bogus Bull of Pope Adrian IV. Already we have shown the diabolical mendacity of Judge Maguire's principal witness against the Popes, upon the evidence of such reliable testimony as that given by the Abbé McGeoghegan, and now let us place on the witness stand of the Superior Court of San Francisco other unanswerable witnesses whose evidence will not only fully corroborate the truth told by Abbé MacGeoghegan, but some of whom go even in further extremes in their just condemnation of the bribe-taking calumniator of both the Pope and the Irish people, the steel pygmy of Henry the Second—Giraldus Cambrensis.

Speaking of the inhuman brood of bloodthirsty Washmen whom the iniquitous Irish traitor MacMurrough gathered around him in Wales, when he applied to King Henry II. of England for help to avert the threatened vengeance of the Irish people, Professor Martin A. O'Brennan, in the first volume of his Irish Antiquities, draws the following brief but graphic picture of the penitentiaries which adorned their characters:

> "Almost every history on Irish matters, even Wright's, (brought out by Tallis), has agreed that the cause of religion in Ireland, at that very time, [the time of Henry's invasion] did not require any reformation and could not expect it from the allies of the adulterous, perjured Mac Murrough. Who were his first adherents in Wales? The Fitz Henrys, illegitimate sons of Henry I., and other children of Nesta, the concubine of the said Henry, viz. De Gros, Fitz-Gerald, Fitz Stephen, the three De Barris, one of whom was the infamous Cambrensis—all the offspring of the lawless Nesta—a vicious monarch, with Cavanagh, his bastard son, were the best of robbers who, at first, gave their adhesion to Dermod. (God) love a dog in the profession, that so inland which was so powerful in resources should become the prey of such an infernal banditti—all the issue of sin! The soul shrinks back from the contemplation of, and the flesh of the hand that writes these lines, creeps with disgust at the mere recording of Judge Maguire's most prominent witnesses against the Popes.

> "Gerald Barry (Cambrensis), Welshman by birth, monk by profession, lacker and sycophant by salary, was the first British historian to deal with Anglo-Irish affairs. James A. Froude, Englishman in birth, ex-theologue by profession, liar and artisan by temperament and education, is the latest adventurer who has donned the cap of Cambrensis.

> Each may be accurately described as the historian laureate of England, based upon his prestige by praising his master through thick and thin, and hulling at no cheaks of rude fact while doing so. The Welshman was commissioned by Henry II. to paint the Irish as a lawless, graceless, godless crew; as Gerald promptly reported that "their chief characteristics were treachery, thirst for blood, unbridled licentiousness, and inveterate detestation of order and rule"! Of the scribe who penned these words it has been said that he never spoke the truth, unless by accident."

A man whose moral character is so bad that "he never spoke the truth except by accident," is hardly up to the standard of historians who are worthy of belief. Cambrensis may be good enough authority for Judge Maguire, but we feel assured that Catholics must have more credible and reputable testimony before they will adopt Judge Pepes Adrian and Alexander guilty of having made over Ireland to the Monarch of Thomas à Becket, on the testimony of a witness who has the reputation of "never having told the truth except by accident."

The next witness we will call in order to enlighten Judge Maguire upon the character of Cambrensis, is the celebrated Irish poet and historian Thomas Moore, who then outlines the reasons which should impel all impartial-minded people in refusing to give credence to a single statement made by that mercenary maligner of both the Popes and the Irish people. "In estimating the value of Cambrensis' testimony," says Moore, on page 342 of the second volume of his "History of Ireland," "the character of the man himself ought to be taken into account; and, finding him so ready a believer and reporter of all sorts of physical marvels and wonders, we should consider whether a taste for the morally monstrous may not also have inspired his pen, and induced him in a similar manner, to impose as well upon himself, perhaps, as his readers."

Such is the estimate which Thomas Moore places upon Judge Maguire's star witness. And now, let us introduce into the Superior Court of San Francisco the celebrated Irish historian, Moore, and learn the corrupt character of the Popelibeling Cambrensis, as described by him in the presence of the Honor James C. Maguire. Here is Thomas Mooney's testimony, as recorded on pages 107-9-11 of his "History of Ireland":

> "The man who stands conspicuous on the page of time, as the historian and traducer of Ireland, is Gerald Barry, commonly called Giraldus Cambrensis; he was the first stranger who undertook to write a history of Ireland. Giraldus was a Welsh priest, who followed the fortunes of his relatives and who methodically and unhandsomely fell-weed Cambrensis, building up their histories on fictions, for the same motives that actuated Cambrensis, in the twelfth century, have guided the pens of most of the English historians of Ireland since the Reformation. Hammer, Campion, Spenser, Cambrensis, seem to be among the most conspicuous of the English defamers of Ireland; although it must be confessed, with deep humility, that Ireland has your forefathers, Cambrensis, who have undertaken, for English pay, to disparage and libel the nation, though oppressed, least that bore them."

We have other witnesses by whom we might also prove the contemptible, corrupt and untruthful character of Judge Maguire's chief witness, but we think it entirely unnecessary to call them into Court, as the evidence we have already adduced is sufficient to satisfy every unprejudiced person that neither Popes Adrian IV., Alexander III. nor the Irish people, were guilty of the crimes he charged against them. That in Adrian never sent a Bull to King Henry II., bestowing Ireland upon him; Alexander III. never sent a Bull sanctioning, or nor were the Irish people the savages which this libellous hireling depicted them.

And now that we have torn the mask away from Judge Maguire's most treasured witness, and shown him up in all his naked deformity, we will turn our attention to the Bull itself, and next week we will introduce as our first witness in defence of Popes Adrian and Alexander, his Eminence Cardinal Moran, whose learned essay upon that interesting historical question is purposely dispensed by the prejudiced author of "Ireland and the Pope," for the sole purpose of undermining its influence and profiting Irish Catholic readers to reject its truthful teachings.

The name of Cardinal Moran carries with it great weight. He is among the most profound Irish patriots that ever wore a mitre. As an Irish annalist and student of Irish ecclesiastical history he has no equal in our day. He has made the question of the genuineness or the fraudulency of the supposed Bull of Pope Adrian to Henry II., the subject of close study for a number of years. His Eminence visited Rome frequently in order to search among the Vatican archives documents bearing on this great Irish Catholic question, and he spent much valuable time in compiling authorities which add great weight to his able argument, which, by the way, Judge Maguire superciliously throws aside with the curt and caustic criticism that it is "a very industrious but radically defective essay."

Notwithstanding Judge Maguire's prophecy, our Catholic readers have sufficient intelligence to peruse, digest, and decide for themselves whether Cardinal Moran's able contribution in defence of the imputed crimes of whom Judge Maguire has prejudged and condemned, in "defective essay" the author of "Ireland and the Pope" designates it, is an unanswerable argument in proof of the fact that Henry II. of England, and some of his courtiers, forged the so-called Bull of Pope Adrian IV. in order to frame for him and Mary, an excuse for their invasion of Ireland, from papacy to Pope. Adrian (an English) was a man of distinguished ability, and of great moral worth, and of great learning, and of great piety, and of great zeal for the Church, and of great charity to the poor. He was a man

Hints on Cooking.

When we wish to extract juices from any thing we put it in cold water and let it gradually reach the boiling point, so when we wish the vianda to retain their juices and use the water only as a medium for cooking them, the opposite course must be pursued.

Starch enters largely into the composition of many vegetables, and on the prominence of this element depends the digestibility of the vegetable. To free this element and have it thoroughly incorporate itself with the other elements in the vegetable a great amount of heat is necessary, and hence it is that all vegetables should be put down to cook in boiling water.

Some authorities claim that even though water is boiling, it extracts considerable of the starch, and that steam is the only agent that should be employed in cooking many varieties, potatoes for instance. There are as many opinions against as for this method, and while it undoubtedly seems probable, still, equally good results have been obtained from the older method.

Chemists say that potatoes should always be boiled in their jackets, as there various elements detrimental to the wholesomeness of the vegetable that are absorbed by the skin, and that potatoes that are peeled before boiling retain some of these elements.

Those who have the potatoes peeled before boiling think they have a peculiar taste when they are boiled in their skins. Of course it is all the effect of imagination, but one amount of that effect is equal to other thereof that fact, so that if the potatoes have to be peeled use that quite a thick slab is taken off, because there is a very bitter acid lodged in, will quite near the skin, and you must get rid of as much of this as possible. The water, of course, draws most of this out, but it is not as effective as the absorbent nature has provided.

Soft water should be used in cooking vegetables, and the only way safely to have to soften water is put a little salt in it. Six or eight potatoes will need a teaspoonful of salt added to the water; turnips and parsnips require about the same, that is a teaspoonful of salt to a quart of water. If any scum should rise to the surface while the vegetables are boiling it must be carefully skimmed off.

HONEY MEYRES.—One large capful white flour, two tablespoonfuls salt, and two tablespoonfuls baking powder; mix together while dry. Then add two cups of boiled hominy, beaten smooth, three eggs, one half cup melted butter, two tablespoonfuls white sugar, and enough milk to make a thick batter. Bake quickly.

CREAMLIN MEYRES.—One-half pound cavenine flour, four ounces sugar, one-half teaspoonful baking powder, three eggs, one half ounce salt, two ounces flour. Mix together the eggs, sugar, and hot butter then add the sensitive flour milk and baking powder. Pour well-greased moulds half full of this batter. Put in hot oven.

GRATULATED WHEATGERM.—Bite two and one-half capfuls of fine granulated wheat slowly into a liquid formed of one capful of water and one capful of milk, moistened with salt, then heat rapidly, and fill very hot pans pans well buttered, and bake immediately in a hot oven.

Table Manners.

As little faults are sometimes not polite or orderly at their meals, the following simple and practical rules are given for their your symphony so strongly that you would take up a collection. It's all right. Just the same as you can get $10 or $15 together bring it to me and I'll give you a receipt for it, and then you can be a noble friend!" and he gently patched the visitor out into the street.

"Do you know, Robinson, I'm a rascal?" said the editor, as he resumed his seat. "The man means to help me out, and I helped him out."

Poor Jollypops.

"Well," said Pat Egan the undertaker, "I'm not much of a fighter, but when it comes to boxing, I am easily lay out any man.

"Brown — That is a handsome sunbeam you've got, Robinson. Was it a birthday present?

"Robinson — Yes, one I gave to my wife.

"Woman (to tramp)—After you've eat that pie will you show me a little wood?

"Tramp (eyeing the pie)—Too ma'am, if I'm alive.

"Husband (reading the paper)— What sense some men will make of themselves! Wife—Now, John what have you done this time?

"Florette," said her mamma, "why do you keep up such a constant chatter, don't you ever talk at all the time?"

"Tween I dot lots to say," Florette ex. plained.

"Sho (at a revival)—Is it possible that the little fellow sitting on the platform is the boy preacher?

"Ma—Oh, no; he is the boy preacher's little grandfather.

"A colored woman brought her baby to be baptized the other day, and when asked what name she preferred for it, chose the word "Amos" as she liked its sound and it was in the bible.

"Chicago Man—Were the designers uninstructed!

Boston Man—Uninstructed! Well I should say so! They were the most ignorant persons I ever saw!

"Green Grocer—I'll give you 10 cents a head for that load of antiques, Mr. Hayseed.

Mr. Hayseed—Not much, you won't, I get more o'that fer 'em up at the cigar factory."

"The cause of the dying out of the Indian races has at last been ascertained. A prominent dime novel writer has made out a list of the number he has killed—on paper—since he began to write, and computes it at little less than 18,000,000 Indians.

"The late Dr. Bethune once asked a morose and miserly man how he was getting along. The man replied: "What business is that of yours?" Said the doctor: "Oh, sir, I am one of those who take an interest in even the meanest of God's creatures."

"Critics—Why don't you give up begging and go to work? A strong man like you could easily make a dollar a day.

Beggar—Of course he could; but what is a dollar a day in a man with a wife and seven children? I have my dear ones to consider.

"Are you familiar with Thackeray's works, Miss Rosier? asked Mr. Miller of the daughter of the Pittsburgh girl, and she artlessly responded:

"Can't say I am. I do not keep the run of half the foundries they are putting up in town."

Family Fun.

Nodcherry as a Neighbor.

Mr. Spanglewood came over to Mr. Noodleberry's the other day, with an air of brotherly love, and wanted to borrow the garden hose to wash the windows with.

"Come my garden hose, do you?" said Mr. Noodleberry. "Take it, Mr. Spanglewood, take it. Walk off with it. Use it up; burst some one night hollow in it. Hand the scamla cross-eyed. Burst the joints. Stuff the hose up with mud. Get around to bring it home next fall, after the luxuriant growth of the Noodleberry onion patches has withered in the unshaked dirt of a robust autumn, and then unfold to me that ancient fable about having 'told the bird girl to bring it home last spring.' Spanglewood, I am glad you were thoughtful enough to come after that garden hose. Ever since I bought it I have instinctively felt that it was too good and pure for this life, and I ought to lend it to somebody. And when you have used that up come and get the Noodleberry lawn-mower, and fail it run out its childish glee upon the festive oyster cans and glass bottle spouts that compose the shrubbery on the Spanglewood hog pasture. Log off the hose and the lawn-mower. Take the fan and the stove. Send a carriage over the woodpile. Make yourself perfectly at home. What I owe I get to lend. It's cheaper to borrow than to steal—naves lawyers fees you know. Don't buy anything, my dear Spanglewood, as long as the Noodleberry estate holds a single object worthy of your envious eye. Don't buy anything, whatever I have in yours—if you get it. Take the hose, Mr. Spanglewood, and if you another one to lend you in case some one should steal that one away from you. And Mr. Spanglewood wiped his boasted hose and spread the floor.

Mr. Spanglewood withdrew in deep gloom, with a digestion as gone as one hand and a dark hay sadness in his soul. As the garden hose swings gayly to the breeze from its accustomed nail under the back steps of the house of Noodleberry.

The social circle is solemn emotion rented Noodleberry "mean and stingy" and agreed "not to neighbor with an any more." and Mr. Noodleberry sheds no tears when as he sees his possessions left to his own personal enjoyment, and finds that he can weed the garden without putting a Philadelphia detective on the trail of the hose, and is able to groan his wagon without rushing violently around the neighborhood after the wrench.

A clerical looking gentleman entered an Austin newspaper office, and drawing out a condensed document, said to the editor: "I am soliciting for a high-toned gentleman of intelligence and refinement. He is really in need of money. Yet he has proved to let the public know it."

"I am hopeful of securing quite a handsome little sum."

"You are the unfortunate man is very intelligent, highly refined, and all that sort of thing."

"That's just the kind of a man he is."

"And too proud to beg."

FATHER ADAM'S LETTER.

The Universal Exhibition at Barcelona. — Visit of the Queen Regent.—Her Great Provincial Pomp.—Spanish Season and Festivities.—Solemn Services and Imposing Ceremonies.

BARCELONA, Spain, June 9, 1888.

Dear Sir:—Having at my disposal a little leisure time before I leave Spain for France, England and Ireland, I thought I would keep my word and say something concerning the Universal Exhibition which was inaugurated in this city from the visit of the Queen Regent and the royal family on our occasion. Till a few months ago the idea of opening the Exhibition early in the year seemed chimerical. Everything was behind time, and it was a day-dream when the Queen arrived she would find sufficient every thing ready for the Exhibition for the first time in Spain. Except the Japanese and Arts departments all the rest were to fare, and the actors displayed from that time a wonderful activity.

At one time 15,000 men were working inside the place, some as bricklayers, and others as carpenters, painters, etc. Buildings and pavilions appeared here and there as if by magic, so that, a day or two before the solemn inauguration, the Mayor of Barcelona could safely say that few cities have exhibited so many objects for inspection on the day of the opening of their Universal Exhibitions.

America and the Philippines would take much more time than Spain to be able to satisfy their curiosity, and would be able to satisfy their curiosity. A full account of the Exhibition must now appear, and I will content myself with mentioning the several buildings, namely—the Palace of Industry, Palace of Fine Arts, Arch of Triumph, Café Restaurant, Palace of Machinery, Palace of Industry, Iron Bridge and Section of Marines.

The principal ones are the Palace of Fine Arts and the Palace of Industry, both of which were the scenes of the ceremonies. In the first one the official inauguration by the Queen Regent took place. The Palace is the largest hall of any of the public halls, with beautiful paintings representing frescoes from renowned artists adorn the walls. The central scenes of Charles V., Philip II., Philip III., and other Kings are exhibited in a very good style, together with some furniture from the royal house of Madrid. In this building a portrait from Vich, Spain, is placed in honor on the best post. He received the first premium. The portrait, which is not over probable, is said to be painted at the request of the municipality, and represents the Queen Regent in the dress of the Queen of Montserrat, and the sword or cross over her breast represents the Queen of Montserrat, and the sword or cross back, but the Queen of Montserrat is represented as a young lady, and the Queen Regent is represented as a matron. The bishop and Canons went to meet the royal carriage at the corner of the street that leads to the Cathedral, which was covered with crape. The Archbishop Cardinal gave the Queen the stole, and under a canopy she was borne by the canons to the Cathedral, which is 75 yards from the palace.

The ceremony of so much solidity is not the best manner to make a favorable impression, as I understands this better than the Queen of Spain. On this occasion, next day, in her private carriage, without a soldier to accompany her, she left the Palace, and, as she stopped in front of the convent of Carmelites and the sword or cross over her breast, she ordered her carriage to be opened and her carriage back, but she, of course, had loved and adored Christ, and was prepared to a martyrdom. The bishop's 143 metres long and leads to the Northern Cemetery.

It was on this bridge that I saw the Queen a few days ago, and I was pained at the inferiority for the last time. Before her Majesty ascended the wide stairway of sufficient dimensions to lead to the bridge, it was already crowded by thousands of persons. The bridge had recently been noble structure, which does honor to the iron works of Barcelona, and the Catalonians showed their real character of industry and energy. They began to "away from here, away, let us alone." The Queen being this month advised one of the very few officers that accompanied her, what did it cost, and when she was told the price she said it did not wish to be restricted and wished to feel her way, she said her Majesty, "I wish to be a queen of human beings, giving a great lunch to the Queen, presiding at the Exhibition, and, as a lady, and surrounded by Majesty all about the portion. I do not know what I do, but I know I have been in the most miserable condition. Where is the Queen, proclaimed themselves down the road, surrounded her Majesty all the time the period. I had consoled to see Queen Christina fatigue than I do, and I was ashamed of my cowardice. If I will soon always to consult your reason that an adopted child is also to be an Republic will consider himself as also to be an Republican.

To the Queen I said that many times we in Spain are ashamed to be a civic procession, and the Queen proceeded up the street where the Protestant visits New York or any other city of the East. But what is the principle motive? not, that makes them propose stand in Lorenzo's name a man dressed in civilian clothes when they call President, or to see decorate with bunting or flags, or anything else? Catholic you will answer is the chief motive. I reply the same thing in my case. Queen of Queen was a woman in my case, I proceeded to see Jesus, and I would be ashamed to say that I was not at least man, but I would be ashamed to be a coward. I would be a man, and I shed tears, in fact so often I was in my cell, and my heart and my soul were in pain with her quiet, modest and unassuming manner. I felt I was a coward in my heart to be so ungainly with a widow, to be a man without, and yet I felt, in honor virtue, medically when we find it in the highest station of life, I stand or come out to be bowed in respect and adoration. I am pleased to state that the Queen of Spain, in her manner, is a lady, a matter of what sound or political color they are, they have left from happiness to be bowed in respect to the high intelligence of a lady, and virtuous character. She is a lady in her moral and virtuous character. She is a lady in her manner, and, as I have stated saying, see how people appreciate this moral quality, and how respect she is in her ways. And it is amongst the latest ideas that he has found that they are most for her royal person.

HIDDEN THINGS.

There are sorrows we never mention,
And times we must shrink from,
Loving hearts will break in silence,
With never a sigh or moan.

There are memories event that we shrink,
And guard with tenderest care,
For deep in our hearts we have buried
The casket of jewels rare.

Still oft-times in the quiet gloaming,
When no one but God may view—
One by one we call up those memories,
And o'er them shed tears anew.

We keep slights and bitter reproaches,
Words we'd forgive and forget,
For when from hearts we would cast them,
Memory whispers—"Not yet."

There is love the tendrest and purest—
That never is made to hold,
While the heart is consumed by its fire,
The fane remains cold and cold.

There are talents that ever lie buried,
Beautiful thoughts unexpressed,
Bright hopes that are born but to perish,
Wrongs that are never redressed.

But among the things that are hidden,
Faiest thus all in God's sight,
Is the beautiful tender confidence
Keeping one ever alight.

RETREAT IN THE FOREST.

Alone in the desert He hands and prays,
Pains thus all in God's sight,
With love for His fallen yet Godlike man—
He His heavenly Father shows.
He sighs and He sobs that God might glance
On man with compassionate eye,
And blot out the sessions that die has made
On his soul with malignity.
And bendeous deep down He prays to His God,
For groans that He has met on
The resplendent soul of the Saviour of men—
On His only begotten Son.

But why does He fly to the forest so drear,
Devoid of all human life?
Does He go to prepare for the battle so near,
For the terrible, wonderful strife,
Deep traged by the Maker of Heaven and earth,
And the Author of Evil below?
He goes but to open the Eden so fair,
That man through its portals might go,
He goes to prepare for the conflict with sin—
The enemy deadly to men—
To lovingly cleanse the sin hardened soul,
And make it His temple again.

Downcastly He walks on the sun-scorched soil,
The enemy ever fully near—
Surprised at the Man who resisted his darts,
Who knew not the nowhence of fear.
Three days—lengthened days—did he strive to attain Possession of Christ's stainless soul,
But he trembingly rushed 'neath the glance of the Lord,
Whose presence to agony roll.
Harmlessly fall his arrows all home;
And his words with severe pillied,
Unheeded even heard, plus his mind's constant moan,
By Him, the Lord Crucified.

As eloquent issues His preacher to man,
From the depths of the woods, old and rude—
To terrifically fee from the Tempter's event voice,
Or Death's dire and cruel will bend;
To list not the strokes of Glory's frail speech,
Yet Ambitionly and cruelly
But upon them dy soulless of happiness true,
Misfortune's ill fate, weak, swerving men,
And rob him of God to the sky.

Oh! humbly bannock, frail man, your God—
Oh! ask Him to kindly bestow
Humility's plant, whose perfume will stand
The terrible repast of woe.
Aye, naught will enliven the heart of our Lord,
As when Virtue in simplicity lies,
And never does Heaven grant forth with such joy,
As question from sweet ministry eyes.
Let i when an humble deed is wrought,
Straight through such angel soul,
With tranquil essay and ethereal song,
The celestial crown of pleasure roll.

Why Aunt Amy Never Married.

A Story with a Moral.

BY TANTALON.

A rather mature-looking lady was seated one evening by a bright fire, when her little niece, May, ran in to her.

"What are you thinking about, aunt Amy?" she asked laughingly.

"I was musing, darling," said the lady, sadly, "of the once golden past, and the old days come back at memory's call, but May will not bring the old joys back, dear."

"Darling Aunnie," said May, in her own winning way, "do tell me of those days. tell me a story. I am so tired. I have been studying, studying, and I am so tired."

"What!" she exclaimed, "you want poor old aunt Amy, with her sad heart and white locks, to tell you a story! Why! I declare, you are as big a baby at twelve, as you were at six. But," she added, as she took up her knitting, "I suppose I must."

"Tell me why you are an old maid!" asked the child, earnestly.

Aunt Amy smiled as she replied, "I will relate to you an adventure that happened when I was a young lady, and then you will know why I never married."

The child seated herself at her aunt's feet as the latter began her story.

"I was living at that time in the far west, in a beautiful country home. I was an only child, and my mother being an invalid, of course I was felt a great deal to my own wills. Idolizing me as my father did, every whim was gratified, and all the advantages of intellectual training were bestowed upon me, but I had much rather romp the fields for an hour's sport than amuse myself with books or music. So one day I determined to have some fun, and accordingly sent an invitation to all the young ladies and gentlemen of the neighborhood, to attend a picnic to take place among the surrounding mountains.

"What a bright crowd of happy faces the appointed morning saw, each maiden in her neat cotton frock and gingham sun-bonnet, while the young men in their large brimmed hats and gray linen suits, carried the well-filled lunch baskets to our starting place. Ah, dear! we were bound for a jolly time then."

"I am sure you had it," said the child, her eyes glowing at the thought.

"Well," continued aunt, "if we went, a great old ostrich bringing most of us with our baggage, while the remainder of the party, including myself, went on horseback. I am tell you, May, as I went riding along on my gray pacing palfrey, with the handsomest fellow in the party as my escort, I did feel proud, and besides, I had two or three times, if then I knew life was gone. Almost so, I pleaded to her, and to my frantic entreaty for one look of forgiveness, as if in deed face could have given sign of aval. I crouched over the awful body, I asked how the jagged rocks had lacerated left side, and the sight seemed to wound my so heart. How long I remained in that state I know not. My mind was as if asod by the shock, and anguish I was undergoing, while my eyes fastened themselves on the form beneath, that looked like a impalm bundle in the depths below. Oh, by! even to this day I can see that white face all motionless and still with its blue eyes so familiar to my eye.

"After a while the dreams came creeping on, but I heeded them not, sure that it brought with it the soul sense of my position along with the dad, watchin g over me so injured by me. But I would have yearned to smooth back at poor broken limbs to their place Wat consolation I would have found in cringing her disheveled locks! But no, no repentant eye would but gaze on her; in hands seemed debarred from touching her. Slowly went the moments until they unglued into my bones, and as I remained here, to me it seemed as if I had been as a watch over her whose I had drove to death. And how those long, long hours passed, each bringing some new terror. The wild birds began to flap their wings in the eaglery, and I could see them as they flew over and around the corpse of Agnes. With a fearful heart, I gazed my soul sickening on the sight, I still looked on, hoping against hope, that perhaps not her lifeless frame, else perhaps my reason would have deserted me. May! May! it was an awful death, and the anguish of those hours changed my once raven tresses to white.

"How did they find you, aunt? Did Eldred Hurtone come back?" asked May, wonderingly.

"Why," continued my aunt, "the Indians reported him as he was seeking Agnes, and they would have killed him but for the intercession of a powerful chief whom Eldred's father had at one time favored. He protected him and after a few days sent him back to the settlement in safety.

"But my father found me. The others on their arrival had told that we wandered off, and father with some neighbors started back to look for us, and although search was found me half dead with weariness and mental suffering. My father came up first, and his joy and his sorrow, folded me in his arms saying tenderly:

"'My darling, dearest one! you are safe.'

"I did not speak—I did not even by one smile return his rapturous greeting, but I remained mute, as if I understood not. "'My poor child!' he said kindly, 'you are so pale as death, and merciful heavens! he exclaimed, as the light fell full on me, your hair is white as frost!'

"At that moment Mr. Raynor came up.

"'Where is Agnes?' he demanded, as he saw me standing alone. 'Where is my child?'

"I could not speak. With a shudder I pointed out the ravine. They understood me, the party gathered at it, and I, I know how chill I felt gone of the cold horror that burst from my lips when I saw the form of Agnes lying there.

"At length I raised my head and looking up, I saw father standing by my side, with a tender look in his eyes, and kindly, pitying smile on his face. I rock that projected far below in the depths of the gorge. The smiling sun from the mountains flowed into the pyre, and the waters locked black, so far down was it from the spot where I stood.

"Perhaps the solitude of the scene and dead my feelings, or the falling shadows may have impressed me, for I felt somewhat superstitious for my wicked wish, though my heart was still quivering beneath its fluid tide of passion.

"Suddenly Eldredge's quick step startled me as he ran breathlessly up.

"'Away! darling,' he cried excitedly; 'away, the Indians are upon us! All are scattered but us three, the brave are rallying, quick—where is Agnes?'

"'She is gone over the 'Leap' she must be on the other side,' I faltered out.

"'Merciful goodness!' he exclaimed, 'they are coming that way. Speed, Amy, be cried, as he dashed off. 'I will seek Agnes, you my partners the others.'

"I moved not. I stood petrified by the awful reality of the case. A sharp pain shot through my heart as my own wild wish rang in my ears, and I realized even in that moment of misery that I had caused her to rush into danger. And, May, through all the long, long years, my heartless words have haunted me like some phantom vision.

"My aunt buried her face for a moment in her hands, then resumed:

"I stood motionless in suspense, waiting for the terrible end. Louder came their yells, and swiftly like some tremendous wind-storm they rushed out from the mountains on the opposite side, and as I stood spell-bound, I beheld to my unspeakable horror the slender figure of Agnes rushing down the path almost across from me, and the savages closely pursuing her.

"Suddenly she stopped; it was but for a moment. She turned her white face back on her pursuers, gave one look, and then with a bound up to heaven, she was bounding over the ravine.

"In her desperation she had dared the impossible, and she fell with one awful shriek into the depths below.

"Seeing her fall, the Indians turned back, while I stood as if chained to the spot, so extreme was my terror; but soon gaining command of my faculties, I hurried down the side of the path, and reached the red spot, but oh, heavens! what a sight met my eye.

"Bitterness and pride had died in my heart at the first moment of danger, and girlish affection as of old came back for Agnes, and when I saw her lying still on the projecting rock, a mangled heap, I felt as if my wicked words had rung out her funeral knell. In my agony I rushed out to her, in my grief I called her by every fond name, but no sound gave token of her existence. I knelt on the edge of the ravine, and even as I did so, I saw her grasp Mandeville's Murder.

HIS HORRIBLE TREATMENT IN JAIL.

THE HORRORS OF TULLAMORE.

Some Shocking Revelations.

In a recent occasion a representative of the London Star called on Mr. O'Brien. He has hitherto inquire after the sad death of his fellow-prisoner in Tullamore, Mr. John Mandeville. Mr. O'Brien appeared very sadly affected at the loss of his friend. "You have heard, I presume, Mr. O'Brien, of the sad new from Ireland, and that your friend, Mr. John Mandeville, has passed away?" "Yes, unfortunately, replied Mr. O'Brien. "The news shocks me beyond expression. I had hoped against hope that there must have been some mistake, when I think of what poor Mandeville's last day we went to prison together it seemed wonder our poor friend should be so soon to go." "Then Mr. Mandeville must have been a strong, healthy man at that time." "Certainly: he was distinguished for his strength. I have ever met sym upon. He had wished to pick out from the Irish race a man to represent its physical strength, manliness, courage and quietly. I should without hesitation have named John Mandeville. He was a man of fine stature, of a most nicely proportioned, so indeed as to look of smaller stature. He moves from a family of giants. He has four brothers not one is under six feet in height and fortieth stone in weight. The eldest, Mandeville, and his brother Andrew, whom right side has been paralyzed for some years, but who received a salve out in his forehand during the famous struggle at Mitchelstown.

JOHN MANDEVILLE, BELONGING TO ONE OF THE OLDEST TIPPERARY FAMILIES, who have always held a position of wide respect and influence, with that comparative wealth which attaches to the gentlemen farmer class in Ireland. He was a free holder of his farm, situated at Clonakilty, near Mitchelstown, and he was therefore above any suspicion of motive in his struggle for thirlsamus. As a matter of fact he was one of the most sensible men, who ever lived. If Mr. Mandeville died (continued Mr. O'Brien) that he was killed in prison does not admit of one moment's doubts. It would be the merest farce for a man who knew him to wait for the verdict of a jury. When we were brought to Cork prison together in a brougham. said Mr. O'Brien, reverting to the scene of the Mitchelstown affair, "surrounded by Hussars, we had an opportunity of discussing our action in prison. Mr Mandeville was most anxious to follow out to the letter the rules that I had publicly laid down for myself—that

I WOULD NOT WEAR PRISON CLOTHES,

associate with criminals, or perform any menial office. We had agreed to stand by each other in the struggle, and I felt very proud of my companion. Mr Mandeville was most anxious to follow out to the letter the rules that I had publicly laid down for myself—that

Mr. Mandeville suffered terribly in consequence from diarrhoea, but his tremendous frame enabled him to bear this quite cheerfully and lightly. I several times sent him word that this resistance to prison clothes must be a matter of a few days, and while I was quite determined to risk my own life in the matter I did not think, having regard to his wife, and the more brutal treatment he was certain to get, that he should resist. He, however, had now gone too far, and in my case they were treating him just as badly for refusing to listen on his bed, and for refusing to associate with criminals. They then took away his bed clothes by force, leaving the poor fellow in a state in which he wrapped around him. This was in mid-winter, and Mandeville tried to warm himself by walking up and down in his cell. He endured this horrible torment and was alone. He knew that I was confined and water for the twenty hour hours. The governor was his enemy, but the doctor was to be taken from him, and that he would be left absolutely at the mercy of the governor. It was only then that he put on the prison clothes. The New Bishop of Vancouver Island.

The Cathedral of St. Andrew, in Victoria, Vancouver Island, British Columbia, was on Sunday last, the scene of one of the most imposing rites in the elaborate ceremonial of the Catholic Church. On that day a Prelate was consecrated to preside over the destinies of that See, in the person of HENRY REV. JOHN NORBERT LEMMENS, who was born on the 3rd of June, 1850, at Schimmert, in the Province of Limburg, Holland. The new Bishop was educated at the American College, Louvain, and was ordained by the Vicinia Missionum Marchi 29th, 1875, arriving at the See to which he was subject, on August 21st, 1876.

The first mission undertaken by FATHER LEMMENS was at Nanaimo and among the Indian tribes adjacent to Victoria. Then he was appointed Rector of the Cathedral at Victoria, and in 1885 he went in company with Father J. Noclaye to give missions among the Indians of the West coast of Vancouver Island. FATHER LEMMENS was always a great favorite with Archbishop Seghers, and it is said that the martyred Prelate intimated a desire to have him as his successor in case he never returned from his missionary tour among the glaciers of Alaska.

When the duty devolved upon the Rev. Clergy of selecting a successor to Archbishop Seghers, they were almost unanimous in their choice of FATHER LEMMENS, who possesses many virtues which can adorn the character of a Prelate in the Church of God. The Bishop-elect is not only a ripe scholar but he is also a profound theologian; he is a phenomenal linguist, and his experience among the Indian tribes well qualifies him to succeed Alaska's martyred Prelate and to take up the work of the Diocese whose Archbishop Seghers laid it down.

The imposing ceremonies on Sunday last drew together a large number of the Prelates and Priests of the Northwest, among whom were the Archbishop of Oregon, Most Rev. W. H. Gross, who was the consecrating Prelate, and nearly all the Suffragan Bishops of the Oregon Province, including Rt. Rev. Aegidius Junger, of Nesqually; Rt. Rev. J. B. Brondel, of Montana; Rt Rev. A. J. Glorieux, of Idaho, and Rt. Rev. L. J. De Herbomez, O. M. I., of the Vicariate Apostolic of British Columbia. A Victoria correspondent has kindly promised to send us a full account of the ceremonies, which we hope to receive in time for our next issue.

A Great Encyclical.

In the language of commerce, it will "pay" every Catholic and non-Catholic in America to peruse with care and attention the superb Encyclical letter of the Holy Father on "Human Liberty," which we publish in full this week. It should be read aloud in every family circle; the Catechisms of youth boys and girls in every college, academy and parochial school in America, so that the rising generation of Catholics might have a thorough understanding of true liberty which the Holy Father so forcibly interprets as "the highest gift of nature." This Encyclical is a masterpiece of erudition and a mountain of logic. It places Pope Leo XIII. in the foremost rank of his wises predecessors and it will exercise a vast influence in opening the minds of millions of Catholic to the difference between liberty and license.

—The Rome organ of the Italian government charges the Pope with provoking rebellion against the government, because the Holiness advised the Italian clergy not to obey the law passed suppressing tithes—the law being subject. The Government had decreed the abolition of tithes, but through the Sacred Penitentiary the clergy received instructions to refuse absolution to those who insist upon exemption from an obligation imposed by conscience and confirmed by the prescription of the Council of Trent "When the New Code comes into operation," says the Tribune, "clergymen will no longer be permitted to compel Catholics to revolt against the law of the State." That is to say the priests and the faithful will be punished or criminals for obeying the teaching of the Church.

—The revelations of the Mitchelstown inquest into the causes of the death of John Mandeville, which we publish on the third page of this issue, add another lurid chapter to the history of Castle rule in Ireland that has not been equalled in the atrocity it displays since the days when the men of Ninety-eight were murdered in prison by Castlereagh's myrmidons. The fate of Mandeville and the suicide of his jailor-doctor show how true was the declaration of Mr. Bunn, that it was the cold-blooded purpose of Balfour to kill all the Irish leaders by the slow but sure death-dealing operation of the coercion prison-system.

—A subpœna from Rome brings the pleasing intelligence that Rev. J. S. Foley, rector of St. Mathew's church, Baltimore, has received the nomination of Bishop of the diocese of Detroit, succeeding Bishop Borgess, who resigned one year ago, and that Rev. J. J. Hennessy of St. John's church, St. Louis, is to be Bishop of Wichita, Kas., succeeding Dr. O'Reilly, the first Bishop, who died last year.

—The immigration from Italy promises to be fully equal to that from Ireland, if the present excuse keeps up for a few years. Last year 45,720 Italians landed in New York, and for the first six months of this year the number was 58,155. Italy, like Ireland, is groaning under excessive taxation, a lack of home industries, and bad government.

—Cardinal Howard is dying, papers having recently been offered up in the Lourdes churches for his speedy recovery or happy death.

General Sheridan Dead!

On last Sunday night winged words of sadness were wafted over the wires from the East. The death of GENERAL PHILIP HENRY SHERIDAN, the hero of a hundred battles, although not altogether unexpected, cast a gloom of sadness over the city which was typified by the numerous half-mast flags that drooped on their staffs, seeming as if the very Stars and Stripes had become imbued with the sorrow which thrilled every heart that pulsated beneath its folds.

GENERAL SHERIDAN was a typical Irish American Catholic. He was born of Irish parents in Perry County, Ohio, in the year 1831. Passing through his graduation course in West Point in 1853, he was sent out to Oregon, where he did duty and saw much service for several years, taking an active part in the numerous Indian difficulties which transpired in the Northwest during those days. At the breaking out of the Civil War he entered at once upon active duty as Captain, and literally fought his way to promotion until he achieved the highest honor a soldier can win, the station of Major-General of the American Army.

GENERAL SHERIDAN deserves the grateful prayers of Catholics for his soul, not only because he was a noble type of the Irish-American race, but particularly because in all his wonderful prosperity as he ascended the dizzy heights of fame, he never forgot the lowly refuge in he had learned at his mother's knee.

Fortunately for GENERAL SHERIDAN'S fame, he did not think that to forsake the Faith of his fathers was a necessary act in order to achieve renown. He did not ignominiously renounce his faith, as many foolish people do, under the false impression that by casting off their Catholicity they can rise higher in the social scale.

For such cowardly Catholics let the career of GENERAL SHERIDAN be a shining example. Let them learn from his life, that the Catholic who clings to his Church throughout his earthly career, is the best citizen in civil life and the bravest soldier in the defence of his native or adopted land. Apostates are always cowards, and though they may purchase place and pelf at the expense of their soul's salvation, they are generally despised by the very men Catholics into whose society they push their perverting presence.

GENERAL SHERIDAN died a happy death. For months before his demise he was visited almost daily by the Rev. Clergy of St. Matthew's church, Washington. His sick chamber was cheered by the constant attendance of Sisters of Charity, and he had every comfort and consolation which our holy faith provides for those sick unto death. The funeral will take place from St. Mathew's Church, in accordance with Mrs. Sheridan's wishes, and will be of the simplest possible character. Cardinal Gibbons will officiate and the obsequies will be attended by an immense concourse of Prelates, Priests and the laity. Previous to the interment of the body in the Soldiers' Home, the Cardinal will consecrate that part of the cemetery which is to be set apart for the General and his family, and then the body will be consigned to the grave with full military honors.

May the soul of GENERAL PHILIP HENRY SHERIDAN rest in peace! May the souls of his scores of war in this world, find eternal rest in the peaceful abode of an everlasting Heaven!

—No event in recent days seems to have aroused the indignation of the Irish people equal to the cruel imprisonment of John Dillon, representative in the Parliament of East Mayo, the Catholic Clergy of which recently met and passed resolutions condemning the Tory torturers of this most estimable Irish patriot. The Rev. Clergy say: "We consider his imprisonment cruel, because, even supposing him a criminal, which few will admit, it is excessive in the opinion of all impartial and fair-minded men. We consider it unjust, because, whilst he was entitled to be judged by a jury of his own countrymen, he had been judged by the Castle Resident Magistrate and sentenced with exceptional severity, not because of his alleged offence, but because of his great influence, which all who know him believe to be exerted always for good and never for evil, and we consider it inhuman, because if continued even half way to the end, it will cause his death—a result inconsonant with his supposed crime, dreaded by his country, which he has so ably, loyally, and unselfishly served, but a result, short of reason to believe, ardently desired by his mean and unscrupulous political foes."

—We call the particular attention of our readers this week to the Pope's Letter to the Irish Bishops which we print in full in another column. This document makes clear to every Catholic that the Holy Father is no more the enemy of Ireland because he found it necessary to condemn Catholic morality as the basis of political action in Ireland, than is the only Church of God the enemy of mankind because she prohibits her children from performing hundreds of actions which are permissable among Protestants.

—Her. Dr. F. Cassidy, who for some time past has been the President of St. Columba's College, Londonderry, has just arrived in Rome where he has been appointed to the position of Vice-Rector of Irish Colleges.

—Among the candidates for Holy Orders ordained by Archbishop Heurdea while in Louvain, was Her. James C. Clowes, a native born in the United States, but who intends to devote his life to God in the diocese of Trinidad.

—At the request of the Archbishop of Chalcedon, the Holy Father has granted an indulgence of three hundred days to all the faithful who with contrite heart, recite devoutly the "Ave Maria Stella."

—Bishop Gross recently gave an audience to a delegation of workingmen from Sheffield, and he told them that when his second Home Rule for Ireland has political career would end—but not till then.

—Cardinal Manning is now in his 81st year, having been born on July 15th, 1808.

THE FORGED BILLS.

The Peter-Pence Proviso Continued—More Proofs Exhibiting the False Character of the Stipulation—King John's Surrender of Religious Rights to the Pope—Important Documents Relating Thereto—Additional Evidence of the Fractious Nature of the Two Bulls of Adrian and Alexander—The Editor of Cambrensis Criticises Our Article.

In our last issue we showed from reliable historical authority that Ireland never paid Peter-Pence to the Pope, in accordance with the clause of the bogus Bull attributed to Pope Adrian. But we have still further proof to offer in this direction. During the Pontificate of Pope Innocent III., a demand was sent by that Pontiff to the Bishops of England, (but not to those of Ireland) demanding some over-due Peter-Pence from them. This is strong evidence that Pope Innocent III., either never knew of any Bulls by Popes Adrian and Alexander, requiring Peter-Pence from the Irish people in accordance therewith, or, if he had ever heard of them he looked upon them as utterly unreliable.

On page 187 of the first volume of the Chronicles of Hyner, Eadera etc., will be found a document from Pope Innocent which still more forcibly sets forth the fact that the Pope never knew that any Peter-Pence was promised by King Henry II., on the part of the Irish people. The document in question is a Letter which Pope Innocent addressed to Cardinal Nicholas, Bishop of Tusculum, Legate of the Apostolic See in England, and also to Pandolphim, Sub-Deacon, and a familiar friend of the Sovereign Pontiff. In that Letter Pope Innocent says:

"As every house throughout all England is you very well know—must give a very, very penny as the revenue due to the Holy See, the Prelates of England, who have collected the revenue in the times, have disposed of it against the will of the owner, and they have not found to keep the greater part of it for themselves. They have sent 1,700 only three hundred marks; and they have kept more than one thousand marks in their own hands.

Wishing, therefore, that the rights of the Roman Church be protected, We command you by the authority of this letter, and We enjoin strictly, that you resolve in the first place your own hands, and cause that have been paid up to this time, and to obtain them, if necessary, by ecclesiastical censures without appeal. Then you shall send them formally, in Genoa, to pay integrally the balance. We do not see what title they can allege; they cannot produce a privileges granted to them by the Holy See, nor can they prove a prescription of one hundred years against the Roman Church.

Given at the Lateran, on the 5th kalends of February, in the 6th year of our Pontificate."

Here we find that Pope Innocent III. was afforded a most suitable opportunity for demanding the Peter-Pence due to his Holiness from Ireland under the bogus bull which is attributed to King Henry. But the Pope never once alludes to it, he rests upon being paid the collections made in England to the last penny, but he leaves Ireland entirely out of the question. Now, we ask any reasonable individual, what would be the line of argument used in the Papal document, if Pope Innocent had the slightest claim on England for any Peter-Pence collected in Ireland? Would not the Pontiff have included Ireland in the demand? Would not the Holiness was not to be cheated out of his rights, and would he not, therefore, have, that down to the year 1206 the Bull of Adrian had no status whatever in the mind of the Vicar of Christ, and here again we have another proof that the Bull attributed to Pope Adrian IV. was a flagrant forgery.

Now let us cite another historical event wherein additional evidence locally appears against the Peter Pence proposal in the celebrated Bull of Pope Adrian. It is a matter of history that in the year 1213 King John of England (Lackland, or sans terre) after demanding without resources and on the brink of ruin, placed his person and his kingdom under the suzerainty of Pope Innocent III. The Golden Bull which consecrated that document may be found in Rymer, as well as the agreement of King John, wherein occurs this passage:

"Not determined by force, nor constrained by terror, but of our own free and spontaneous will, and of the common consent of our Barons, we offer and freely consecrate to God, to the Apostles Peter and Paul, to the Holy Roman Church, and to our Lord Pope Innocent III., and his Catholic successors, the whole kingdom of England and the whole kingdom of Ireland."

Then the prince promises, among other things, to pay to the Pope one thousand pounds sterling every year, being 5700 for England, and 2300 for Ireland, under pain of forfeiture for himself as well as for his successors.

When offering his kingdom to the Holy See, John had a splendid opportunity whereby to refer to the Bull of Adrian, which, about seventy years previously, had, if a alleged, generously given over the spiritual and temporal affairs of Ireland to the Holy Roman Pontiff. If his father, King Henry II. The prince was aware of the alleged existence of the Bull, because the kingworshiping Cambrensis had dedicated to John a few years before, the third edition of his Expugnatio Hibernica, into which the bogus document was inserted. In fact, so eager was Cambrensis to attract the attention of King John to the bogus Bull, that he wrote the mark by a special appeal to the king in the dedication of the work, calling the particular attention of his Majesty to that document. This of itself is very much like one of the many disreputable tricks which Cambrensis was famous for, and it also tends to cast additional doubt upon the authenticity of the Adrian Bull.

Another query arises in our mind right here. If King John had any faith in the authenticity of the Adrian Bull, why did he not voluntarily offer Ireland? Would it not have been more in accord with common sense on his part, as well as on the part of his counsellors, to tell the Pope that he was already the feudatory of the Holy See in Ireland, by being the immediate successor of his father King Henry II.

Instead of acting in this rational way, however, we find the ruling monarch addressing the Holy Father as if he, the King of England, was entering for the first time into negotiations concerning Peter-Pence with the Pope of Rome. We must, therefore, come to the conclusion that, even in the estimation of the 4 and successor of King Henry II., the Bull Adrian had no value as an official document—even when he was in treaty with a inclinate successor of the Pope who at and to its made it.

If we are astonished at the silence of King John regarding the Adrian's Bull, what excuse can be given for the silence of Pope Innocent III. on the subject? It will be also remarked that the Pope to whom King John bemoan silence, says nothing, of the Bull of Alexander, though that document decrees that a very large sum should be paid as Peter-Pence by the people of Ireland to the Pope, where John offered the paltry sum of three hundred pounds sterling.

Now we ask any commonsense citizen, who has the slightest idea of diplomacy, if Innocent III. would have ignored the Bulls of Adrian and Alexander could not have been alleded to on such a important occasion as the one we have described—provided they were known to Rome? Every person familiar with the mode of procedure in the execution of important treats in Rome, where the interests of a single nation are at stake, will admit that there is no Court in Europe where grander documents are more frequently displayed than in by the Chancellor of the Papal Court. That official has ever been noted for declaring that the Sovereign Pontiff "walks in the footsteps of his predecessors Pope Sylvester, and so, that he "continues the work they have commenced," and then reference is made to Bulls, Briefs, Consulatas or Letters which formerly treated of the question under immediate consideration.

The case of King John and Pope Innocent offered the Papal Chancellor the opportunity which the Roman Chancellor would have been delighted to take advantage of by introducing the ancient official style of "Pseudonorum mulierum colloquia, insinuantes, renunciantes, opponentes, ponentes et confirmantes, etc." if he was afforded the opportunity. But that school found no document of any "predecessor" of Pope Innocent, in whose footsteps his Holiness could "walk," nor could the latter offer coercive his Pontiff to "continue" a course of conduct which neither Adrian nor any other Pope ever commenced! It is perfectly certain, therefore, that neither the Pope himself, nor any official connected with the Papal archives, knew anything of the so-called Bull of Adrian during the Pontificate of Pope Innocent III.

We now come to another very important feature in this surrender of his kingdom on the part of King John. It takes the form of a bargain, and although King John offered "the kingdom of Ireland" to the Holy Father, the Vicar of Christ totally spurned the gift!

In a reference to Rymer's Chronicles (Vol. i, pp. 179) will discover that the Bull of Pope addressed to the Irish people on October 27th, 1213, in which his Holiness informs the Irish people that "Ireland never joins therewith the same England. The Pope styles John "King of the King of Ireland." Now, the Pope, the King of Ireland, John—through the act of donation made by King John—to the Church, and that she possesses "a special right over that kingdom," but does not say that the Church also received by John, as a temporal power whatever over Ireland!

Need we comment on those facts? We think not. They prove, with all the force of truth that Pope Innocent III. will know that although King John of England offered his Holiness full temporal sovereignty over "kingdom of Ireland," still that monarch did not possess a single particle of title to any inch of that island. Hence the Pope wisely ignored John's proposition because he knew that his title was mythical.

In commenting the people of Ireland as to the best course they should pursue in their diplomatic relations with England, Pope Innocent, in the same Letter, says to the "obedience" or "submission" to any English monarch. His Holiness recommends "tranquillity and friendship" on the part of the Irish people towards the Bishops. Nor do we see how the Pope could do otherwise, because the Vicar of Christ was fully acquainted with the fact that the Sovereign of the English kingdom—possessed no temporal power whatever over the Bishops, princes, nobles and people of Ireland. Hence his Holiness could never think of asking them to exhibit their allegiance to any King John and his successors.

Pope Innocent was also well aware of the fact that only a small fraction of Ireland was in the possession of the English, and that the greater portion of the island generally ignored its independence. The Kings of Ireland generally continued to exercise their regal functions in peace; and the chieftains of Ireland which the English did not occupy preserved their independence inviolate. But even supposing that the Pope had ordered submission to King John on the part of the Irish people, such a mandate could only affect those within the English Pale, or the territory which Strongbow and his satellites had stolen by force and fraud.

Returning to the Letter which King John sent to the Pope, we call the attention of our readers to the £300 which that prince promised to send to Rome as his tribute from Ireland. But as little value did Pope Innocent III. place upon the king's voluntary offering, that his Holiness entirely avoided all reference to the "tribute" the Irish people! Like the "gift" of the kingdom of Ireland" which John presented to the Pope, his Holiness received the promised £300 as a myth which looked far more substantial upon the bond of surrender than it was in reality!

In point of fact King John derived no regal title whatever from Ireland. Henry II., who sanctioned the aged abject three centuries after King John, never took against Ireland, and, in delegating it to the Pope, he styles himself King of England and Lord of Ireland. But the Lord knows his "lordship" in Ireland hardly amounted to anything, as he never added a single inch of land to the territory his henchmen usurped! On the other hand, it is known to all readers of history that it was not until the time of Pope Pius IV., that Ireland was created into a kingdom, and this occurred some three hundred and fifty years after King John had offered "the kingdom of Ireland" to a Pope who had no idea of becoming a receiver of stolen goods!

Whilst we are treating of this era in English history, it may not be inappropriate to introduce another instance where the Bull of Pope Adrian was quoted in the pretended Bull of Pope Adrian bulls, but it is not to be forgotten that Ireland never paid Peter-Pence to the Pope, in accordance with the clause of the bogus Bull attributed to Pope Adrian. But we have still further proof to offer in this direction. During the Pontificate of Pope Innocent III., a demand was sent by that Pontiff to the Bishops of England, (but not to those of Ireland) demanding some over-due Peter-Pence from them. This is strong evidence that Pope Innocent III., either never knew of any Bulls by Popes Adrian and Alexander, requiring Peter-Pence from the Irish people in accordance therewith, or, if he had ever heard of them he looked upon them as utterly unreliable.

On page 187 of the first volume of the Chronicles of Hyner, Eadera etc., will be found a document from Pope Innocent which still more forcibly sets forth the fact that the Pope never knew that any Peter-Pence was promised by King Henry II., on the part of the Irish people. The document in question is a Letter which Pope Innocent addressed to Cardinal Nicholas, Bishop of Tusculum, Legate of the Apostolic See in England, and also to Pandolphim, Sub-Deacon, and a familiar friend of the Sovereign Pontiff. In that Letter Pope Innocent says:

"As every house throughout all England—as you very well know—must give a very, very penny as the revenue due to the Holy See, the Prelates of England, who have collected the revenue in the times, have disposed of it against the will of the owner, and they have not found to keep the greater part of it for themselves. They have sent 1,700 only three hundred marks; and they have kept more than one thousand marks in their own hands.

Wishing, therefore, that the rights of the Roman Church be protected, We command you by the authority of this letter, and We enjoin strictly, that you resolve in the first place your own hands, and cause that have been paid up to this time, and to obtain them, if necessary, by ecclesiastical censures without appeal. Then you shall send them formally, in Genoa, to pay integrally the balance. We do not see what title they can allege; they cannot produce a privileges granted to them by the Holy See, nor can they prove a prescription of one hundred years against the Roman Church.

Given at the Lateran, on the 5th kalends of February, in the 6th year of our Pontificate."

Here we find that Pope Innocent III. was afforded a most suitable opportunity for demanding the Peter-Pence due to his Holiness from Ireland under the bogus bull which is attributed to King Henry. But the Pope never once alludes to it, he rests upon being paid the collections made in England to the last penny, but he leaves Ireland entirely out of the question. Now, we ask any reasonable individual, what would be the line of argument used in the Papal document, if Pope Innocent had the slightest claim on England for any Peter-Pence collected in Ireland? Would not the Pontiff have included Ireland in the demand? Would not the Holiness was not to be cheated out of his rights, and would he not, therefore, have, that down to the year 1206 the Bull of Adrian had no status whatever in the mind of the Vicar of Christ, and here again we have another proof that the Bull attributed to Pope Adrian IV. was a flagrant forgery.

Now let us cite another historical event wherein additional evidence locally appears against the Peter Pence proposal in the celebrated Bull of Pope Adrian. It is a matter of history that in the year 1213 King John of England (Lackland, or sans terre) after demanding without resources and on the brink of ruin, placed his person and his kingdom under the suzerainty of Pope Innocent III. The Golden Bull which consecrated that document may be found in Rymer, as well as the agreement of King John, wherein occurs this passage:

"Not determined by force, nor constrained by terror, but of our own free and spontaneous will, and of the common consent of our Barons, we offer and freely consecrate to God, to the Apostles Peter and Paul, to the Holy Roman Church, and to our Lord Pope Innocent III., and his Catholic successors, the whole kingdom of England and the whole kingdom of Ireland."

Then the prince promises, among other things, to pay to the Pope one thousand pounds sterling every year, being £700 for England, and £300 for Ireland, under pain of forfeiture for himself as well as for his successors.

When offering his kingdom to the Holy See, John had a splendid opportunity whereby to refer to the Bull of Adrian, which, about seventy years previously, had, if a alleged, generously given over the spiritual and temporal affairs of Ireland to the Holy Roman Pontiff. If his father, King Henry II., the prince was aware of the alleged existence of the Bull, because the king-worshiping Cambrensis had dedicated to John a few years before, the third edition of his Expugnatio Hibernica, into which the bogus document was inserted. In fact, so eager was Cambrensis to attract the attention of King John to the bogus Bull, that he wrote the mark by a special appeal to the king in the dedication of the work, calling the particular attention of his Majesty to that document. This of itself is very much like one of the many disreputable tricks which Cambrensis was famous for, and it also tends to cast additional doubt upon the authenticity of the Adrian Bull.

Another query arises in our mind right here. If King John had any faith in the authenticity of the Adrian Bull, why did he not voluntarily offer? Would it not have been more in accord with common sense on his part, as well as on the part of his counsellors, to tell the Pope that he was already the feudatory of the Holy See in Ireland, by being the immediate successor of his father King Henry II.

Instead of acting in this rational way, however, we find the ruling monarch addressing the Holy Father as if he, the King of England, was entering for the first time into negotiations concerning Peter-Pence with the Pope of Rome. We must, therefore, come to the conclusion that, even in the estimation of the 4 and successor of King Henry II., the Bull Adrian had no value as an official document—even when he was in treaty with a inclinate successor of the Pope who at and to its made it.

Farm and Home.

A LESSON IN BUTTER.

A little maid in the morning sun,
Stood merrily singing and churning—
"Oh! how I wish the butter was done,
Then off to the fields I'd be turning."
So she hurried the dasher up and down,
Till the farmer called with half frown—
"Don't pity the churn so fast, my dear,
It is not good for the butter,
And will make your arms ache, too, I fear,
And yet you all is a flutter;
For this is a rule when we turn,
Don't be in haste, whatever you churn—
"Churn slowly!"

"If you want your butter both also and sweet,
Don't churn with another intent,
But pity the dasher slowly and neat,
You'll hardly know that you're working;
And when the butter has come you'll say
'Yes, surely, this is the reward
"Churn slowly!"

Now, all you folks, do you think that you
A lesson can find in butter?
Don't be in haste, whatever you do,
Or get yourself in a flutter;
And when you stand at Life's great churn,
Let the farmer's words to you return:
"Churn slowly!"

Facts for Farmers.

—Cows should be milked at regular hours.

—About 100 different kinds of insects are now known to attack corn.

—Shade trees add to the good appearance and comfort of the farm.

—Profit and loss in crops is often determined by careful or careless cultivation.

—May the farmers find time and inclination to undertake less work and do it more thoroughly.

—The secret of success in transplanting, is to keep the roots always moist, and set with dirt firmly packed about them.

—The successful farmer not only profits by his own experience, but also keeps an eye open to the experiments of his neighbors.

—Economy in feeding demands that fodder be used only where it is needed, and that kept in thorough repair.

—Slightly any portion of the farm work generally resolve in ultimate loss, and farmers sometimes make a mistake in hiring too little help.

—Trees intended for shade should not be overstimed, but rather allowed to spread their branches before attaining to great height of trunk

—Use the very best seed and you will realize from the products more than enough extra to pay the difference in cost; the same rule will apply to breeding stock and poultry, and in fact everything on the farm should be of the best quality you can get.

Long-headed, systematic planning is as necessary to the farmer as to the business man. The old notion that any man can be a good farmer proves to be a mistake. Farming has grown to be a science, and the more who make it a success belong to the same school, far-seeing alone as would be successful in any other class of business.

—"Hog Cholera" is said to have attacked stock, on many ranches near Gilroy, one farmer having lost 25 hogs from this cause week before last. Dr. Bastlaigh has recommended a preparation of sulphur, charcoal and copperas to be given not animals with their food and to thoroughly cleanse pens

Garden and Orchard.

—Let the garden be conveniently located where it can be always cared for properly and everything done in season.

—Every farm should be well supplied with fruit, which will prove a source of health and economy for the family, as well as profit, when raised in sufficient quantity to sell.

—The south side of a building affords an excellent protection to trees in winter, and it often happens that such trees bear fruit when the beds of other trees have been destroyed.

—Now are the garden crops as fast as they appear, and prepare the ground for sowing turnips, which are not only good for table use, but afford an excellent winter food for stock, and will probably be the most profitable crop of the season.

Beware of First Steps.

One wrong step has brought many a man to crime, to prison, and death; and many a woman to shame, and sorrow, and due retention. One wrong acquaintance has lost many a person to rags and ruin. One bad bargain has brought many a man to poverty and want. A wrong courtship or wrong marriage has embittered many a joyous life, and broken many a noble heart with anguish and distress. On one single rock a single step made of bad wood. The first plan, the first drink, the first oath, the first gambling, the first theft—ah! What myriad of wrecks are heaped about such rocks as these. Beware of the first wrong step, and you will have no trouble about the second.

Story of a Lady's Bellcnie.

I have heard on good authority that there is an interesting relic preserved in Alwick castle to which a romantic legend is attached. The treasured relic is a lady's reticule, such as was commonly carried seventy years ago, and which did the duty of a pocket. On the night preceding the battle of Waterloo the Duke of Wellington and his chief officers attended a ball at Brussels, given by the Duchess of Richmond, and Maj. Percy, who was present, became deeply interested in a lady whom he met for the first time. When "midnight brought the signal sound of strife," and Maj. Percy and the lady had to part with mutual regret, he begged of her some memoir of their happy meeting, and she resigned to him her reticule. Next day came the great battle, and Maj. Percy was selected to convey to Lord Bathurst the famous dispatch of the Duke, with his admirable description of the conflict, dated Waterloo, June 19, 1815. The precious document was conveyed to the minister, in the treasured reticule. The story as told to me ended with the sad conclusion that the major searched in vain for the owner of the reticule, and they never afterwards met.—Selected.

For the Ladies.

—Gray and white costume are fashionable.

—Lace dresses are more fashionable than ever.

—Gray and white and green of all tones are popular colors.

—Turned back unlacked waistcoats are a feature of many cloth bodices.

—The most suitable fabrics are especially suited for traveling dresses.

—Showy tassie gowns are of white serge braided with gilt and silver.

—A loose cloaker of white poppies with black hearts seems the favorablated garment for black lace bonnets.

—Green's the wear, even for stockings—pale green, dark shaded, with white, or shot green and white embroidered with both threads.

—Tuscaroes are much smaller than last season. Steels are used, but are not tied back so closely as heretofore, giving a more graceful effect.

A HILARIOUS WIDOW.

Memories of Marriage Life Mentioned by a Matrimonially-Inclined Madam

A weather-beaten women, of melancholy and discouraged mien, sat in front of a drummer on a railroad train. She was clad in rusty mourning, and her appearance indicated that her loss was recent. When near Chicago she turned to the drummer and said:

"What place we coming to next."

"Chicago, madam."

"Lemme see; that's in Illinoy, ain't it?"

"Yes—certainly."

"I d ort to know, but I'd forgot I ben to Illinoy. I buried my first husband there bout twenty years ago.

"Indeed?"

"Yes, and from Illinoy I want to leavy. I buried my second man out in Iowy, and I ain't ben there since. That was eighteen years ago. Went down to South Carliny from Iowy."

"Oh, did you? I've been there."

"You has? Ever been to a place called Black Scotta Forks? No? Well, Hon Dollson lays there.

"Was was Mr. Dodson?

"My third man, and a right smart fellow he was. He had a cousin named Hi Dodson. Ever run across him?

"I think not."

"You'd know it if you had. Every body liked Hi. Him and me ware married in Georgy, and he is buried nine miles from Atlanty.

"On, indeed! And do you live in Georgia now?

"Lord no! Ain't set foot there for over a dozen years. I went from Georgy way up to Minnesoty, and I met Tom Hixon up there.

"Tom Hixon!

"Yes; him and me lived most a year there after we was married. Him a blood old white moln we had kicked Tom so totally that I buried him one cold day under the snow ngar St. Paul and sold off and went out to Kansas, near Atchison, and took up a quarter section o' land jinin' a real smart man's named Dill.

"And you—

"Yes, I married Dill, and he took chills and fever three weeks and left me a widder fore the year was out. I tell you I had mighty bad luck.

"I should think so."

"That's what I have. There was Sim Barber, after me and him was married out in California we got along splendid, and was making money fast, when, all of a suddint, Sim gone hand frel down a 900 foot shaft, and, of course, I was a widder. Fare the poor man ever struck bottom.

"Then you left California?

"Yes; I stayed there sight or nine months and then Bob he wanted to—

"Bob who?

"Oh, Bob White. He was Ben's partner, and he never give me no peace till I married him. He is buried in the Black Hills.

"Great Cesar!" cried the drummer, "do you make a business of going round this country burying husbands?

The widder put her handkerchief to her eyes, and said in tones rebuke:

"That's a purty way to talk to a poor toss widder, that's got her husband's corpse in the baggage-car ahead, staking him out to Dacoty to lay bibb side of his other bin folks. You'd ort to be ashamed to be so onfeelin'!"

THE POPE'S ENCYCLICAL.

surprising how far removed from the justice and prudence of the Church are those who profess what is called liberalism. For, in allowing that boundless license of which We have spoken, they exceed all limits, and end at last by making no apparent distinction between truth and error, honesty and dishonesty. And because the Church, the pillar and ground of truth, and the unerring teacher of justice, is unable openly to compromise and condone tolerance of such an abandoned and criminal character, they calumniate her as wanting in patience and gentleness, and then fail to see that, in so doing, they impute to her as a fault what is in reality a matter for commendation. But, in spite of all this show of tolerance, it very often happens that, while they profess themselves ready to shower liberty on all in the greatest profusion, they are utterly intolerant towards the Catholic Church, by refusing to grant it the liberty which is its right.

TO SHUN OFFENCE, FOR CHARITY'S SAKE, to its principal basis, all that has been here written and that follows from it, the summary is this: that, by a necessity of his nature, man is wholly subject to the true and everlasting power of God; and that man has no liberty except that which must be in submission to God and in subjection to His will. To deny the existence of this authority, or to refuse to submit to it, is to act, not as a free man, but as one who reasonably abuses his liberty, and in such a disposition of mind the obedience of God is demanded.—This form, however, of this vice is manifold; for in more wayward degrees than one do the will depart from the obedience which is due to God or to those who share the Divine power. To reject the supreme authority of God, and to cast off all obedience to Him in public matters, and even in those which are private and domestic, is the greatest perversion of liberty and the worst kind of liberalism; and nations that act thus We have and applies in its fullest sense.

THE COURSE THE SYSTEM OF THINGS, who admit indeed the duty of submitting to God, the Creator and Ruler of the world, inasmuch as all nature is dependent on His will; but who boldly reject the laws of faith and morals, which are above the natural order, and are revealed by the authority of God; who at least assert that there is no reason why regard should be paid to these laws, at least in public by the State. He reviews such men also, and how inconsistent, we have seen above. From this doctrine, as the source and principle, flows that fatal maxim of the separation of Church and State, whereas, on the contrary, it is clear that the two powers, though dissimilar in functions and unequal in degree, ought nevertheless to live in concord, by the harmony of their actions and the fulfilment of their respective duties. But this maxim is understood in two ways.—Many wish the State to be separated from the Church by fully and entirely, so that in every right of human society, in institutions, customs and laws, in the offices of state, and in the education of youth, they would say no more account of the Church than if it did not exist; and, at most, would allow the citizens individually to attend to their religious duties, if they pleased. Against them in private and in public We have proved the doctrine of the separation of Church and State are conclusive; and with this additional argument, that it is absurd that the citizen should respect the Church, but the State despise it. Unless does it, opposed the existence of the Church, nor indeed would they put the same rights and duties and rights of a perfect society; and maintain that it does not belong to her to legislate, to judge, or to punish, but only to exhort, to advise, and to rule her subjects according to their free consent and will. By this opinion they would pervert the nature of the Divine society, and attenuate and destroy its authority, its office of teacher and its whole efficiency; and at the same time they would ignominious the power of the Civil government to such an extent as to subject the Church of God to the empire and sway of the State, like any voluntary association of citizens. We completely refute such teaching, the arguments often used by the defenders of Christianity, and set forth by Us, especially in the Encyclical Letter Immortale Dei, of great avail for by those arguments it is proved that, by a Divine provision, the Church is which essentially being a society that is legitimate, supreme, and perfect in all its parts, exist in the Church, THREE REMARK THINGS WHICH, WHILE THEY DO NOT APPROVE the separation of the Church and State, think nevertheless that the Church ought to adapt herself to the times, and to conform to what is demanded by the modern system of government. Such an opinion is sound, if it is to be understood of an adaption that is consistent with truth and justice; in so far, namely, that the Church, in the hope of some good good, may dare herself to point, and may conform to the times in whatever her sacred office permits. But it is in no regard to perversion of morals and a false judgement in unlawfully introduced. Religion truth and justice, must ever be maintained; and as God has instructed these great and sacred things to the care of the Church, she can never be so unfaithful to her office as to dissemble in what is false or unjust, or to countenance what is hostile to religion.

From what has been said, it follows that it is in no way lawful to demand, to defend, or to grant, unconditional freedom of thought, of speech, of writing or of religion, if they were so many rights which nature had given to man. For if nature had really given them, it would be lawful to refuse obedience to God, and there would be no restraint to human liberty.—It likewise follows, that toleration in these things may be tolerated when there is just cause; but only with such moderation as will prevent its degenerating into license and excess. And where these liberties are given to me, men should use them in doing good, and should regard them as the Church does, for liberty to be regarded as legitimate in so far as it gives greater facility for doing good, and no further.

WHEREVER THESE REASONS DO THERE IS NEA, NOT TO FREE, either an unjust oppression of the people, or a deprivation of the Church's liberty, it is lawful to seek for such a change of government as will give due liberty of action. In such a case it is not an excessive and violent liberty that is sought for; but only some relief, for the common welfare, in order that under the license for evil the power of doing good may not be hindered. Again, it is not of liberty to prefer a democratic form of government, if only the Catholic doctrine be maintained as to the origin and use of power. Of the various forms of government, the Church does not reject any that are fitted for the welfare of the subject; she wishes only—and this no more than prudence—that they should be constituted with out wrong to anyone, and especially without violating the rights of the Church. Unless through some exceptional condition of things it be advantageous to the citizens, it is well to take part in the administration of public affairs. And the Church approves of every one giving his services for the common good, and doing all that he can for the defense, and preservation, and prosperity of his country.

NEITHER DOES THE CHURCH CONDEMN those who, if it can be done without violation of justice, wish to make their country independent of any foreign or despotic power. Nor does she blame those who wish to give to the State the power of self-government, and to its citizens the greatest possible measure of prosperity. So long as it is without injustice, or injury to any one, the Church does not condemn the desire of those who wish to live under a form of government to which their character and habits of life are adapted. Nor does she condemn

SIMS.

SUGGESTED BY THE READING OF JOHN BYROM'S VERSES.

Fill the potence and weld the cyrus,
Slander and torture the patient Hiram;
Do as you will—the truth survives,
Murder it if you can.
Burn the bonnes and poach the fables,
Scatter the peasant's modest yields,
Wield the power that a Satan wields,
Remember your mortious bane!
Smother a nation's suffering cries,
Justice and mercy and all despise;
But mark me, Jo-ies and jailer and lord—
God's principle never dies.

THE BAPTISM.

Rejoicing upon calm Jordan's stream,
On to the hillery one,
One sun-lit morn, when Nature seemed
To smile with serenity;
Onward it rolled with murmuring sweet,
Thus hallowed by the Saviour's feet.

Two Men—the Saviour of the world—
The Lord of earth and sky;
In obeisance some at His Father's word
Long ere were born to die.
And stood within the waters bright,
To strengthened be 'gainst sin's dark blight.

Soon on His head the waters fell;
O children, sweet! behold!
St. John as alone as a consoling bell,
The words of absolving said:
In the name of the Triune God whose look
Was centred on Him and the flowing brook.

And lo! through the opening, nothing alike,
A glimpse of Heaven was sought,
And angels' songs in chorus rise,
With words of pleasure fraught;
And a voice spoke loud when the angels ceased—
"My Son, with Thee, I am well pleased."

And forth he went from the water's flow,
To begin His mission of love—
To heal man's heart of the wounds of woe,
And open the Eden above.
O! mighty Saviour of Christians sent,
Recapture our souls with grace again!

Oh! sweet away the stains that mar
Our positive souls. Once more
Make them as pure as a shining star
That lights the way to the heavenly shore;
Make them the image of thy face,
Aglow with innocence and grace.

THE SINNER.

[The following lines were suggested by a small painting in the late Exhibition in this city.]

Misery and varied the beauties of art,
Displayed in vistas of light and drapery rare;
But one, only one, is that gallery's line of fame
Appeals to the heart and touches a hoarded feeling there.

Within a nooky of oak and of gold,
Stands a maiden whose fair, sweet face,
Is pale and wistfully, yet,
Tells a story of lost and innocent grace.

Pull over her shoulders and clouded her face,
And a shadow or dimpled hands
Holding a letter, with the following light,
A letter! Ah! yes! you can see by the glow
Of expressive face, shade and lighting the eye—
By the quick rushing breath through the lips parted half—
*Somebody's written the words the heart can do
no.*

Somebody's pressed from afar o'er the sea,
To the chalice of life's fond lip, and has mashed pride,
A letter whose every line the feeling reveals,
That hide her deep hands in his as a bride.

PENDOWNE.

TO JOHN DILLON, M. P.

In the silence of the prison, in the darkness of thy cell—
Ay, "in prison or within a prison and a blacker hell in hell"—
Where the shadows loom about thee, and the sunlight cannot fall,
Save the pure light of the Spirit which defies state dens to bind grand,

Oh, bentitah thee in thy bondage of the sunshine hearts yet free,
Who would share that bondage gladly—here to tell and share with thee,
For that chasm to them ever honor, and their proudest boast would tell
How they fought with thee for Ireland in a foilon's pork and sell.

Do they think—the puny dwarfs—the sickly crews on land they call
Do they deem thy mass is broken—far as ever from its goal?
Do they willing bind their vision to the course of the hour,
That perchance their coming rule and the downfall of their power?

From the misty plains of England, where thy name is loved as well;
From the Green Isle of Old Scotland rings to day
thy gentlest knell—
Kindly Britons, kindred Scotsmen, league as brothers by thy side,
And the freedom of thy country—hoice with the "Sorting tide."

But forgotten be that country, and defamed be her name!
Be her hill still wrongs and suffering 'neath a hotter
fal tyrant's lawn,
If, when Vinty gives her banner, blas-ed on that banner's crest
Shines not forth the name of Dillon 'mong his brave and her best!

THE PRIEST AT GASTRIE.

If pleasure were the aim and end of all,
And life, so called, to be the ultimate bound
Of my existence; then this thrilling sound,
Tumultuous music of the waterfall
At play forever with the rocks, might call
My days to pomp, and this spacious ground,
Where nature's latest cleverness abound,
Might be my conch, and they, at last, my pall.

But this all yielding earth is not my home,
Nor the dark forest my abiding place;
These pomp blooms but captivate the eye;
The sheer anterlacy mocks me, and I come,
To guide a wayward and rebellious race
To Him who bore His cross to Calvary.

The Mystery of the Thatched House.

A Story of Absorbing Interest.

CHAPTER I

It was a clean, bright, wholesome, thoroughly lovable house. The first time I saw it, I fell in love with it, and wanted to live in it at once. It fascinated me. When I crossed its threshold, I felt as if I had opened a book whose perusal promised enchantment. I felt a passionate longing to have been born here, to have been expected by the brown old watchful walls for years before it had been my turn to enter in this world. I felt disposed of my rights; because there was here a board of wealth which I might not touch, place just beyond the reach of my hand. I was tantalized; become the secrets of a sweetly odorous past hung about the shady corners and the sunny window frames and the grotesque hearth pieces; and their breath was no more to me than the scent of dried rose-leaves.

It was my fault that we hung't the Thatched House. We wanted a country home; and, hearing that this was for sale, we drove many miles one showery April morning to view the place, and judge if it might suit our need. Aunt Featherstone objected to it from the first, and often boasted of her own sagacity in doing so, after the Thatched House had proved itself an incubus—a dreadful Oil Man of the Mountains, not to be shaken from our backs. I took so much enough to tell her that temper, and not sagacity, was the cause of her dislike that April morning. We drove in an open phaeton, and Aunt Featherstone got some drops of rain on her new silk dress. Consequently she was out of humor with everything, and vehemently pronounced her vote against the purchase of the Thatched House.

I was a spoiled girl, however; and I thought it hard that I might not have my own way in this matter as in everything else. As we drove along a lonely road, across a wild, open country, I had worshipped the broken grey old aspen rain clouds, and the hills, with their waving lines of light and their soft trailing shadows. I had sought the shower in my face, and laughed; and dried my limp curls with my pocket-handkerchief. I was disposed to kiss everything I saw, and clapped my hands when an stopped before the sad-looking old gates, with their mossy brick pillars, and their iron arms folded across, as if mournfully forbidding inquiry into some long buried up and forgotten mystery. When we swept along the silent avenue, my heart leaped up in greeting to the grand old trees, that rose towering lonely at every curve, spreading their manes of green foliage right and left, and flinging showers of diamond drops to the ground whenever the breeze lifted the tresses of a drowsy bough, or a bird poised its slender weight upon a twig, and then shook it suddenly into the shade.

Aunt Featherstone criticised and condemned the old carry mans as we drove by.

It was not the sort of thing we wanted at all, she said. It had not got a modern window, and it was all nooks and angles on the outside. The lower windows were too long and narrow, and the upper ones too small, and pointing up where the eaves in that old-fashioned, inconvenient fashion. To crown its absurdities, the roof was thatched. No, no, Aunt Featherstone said, it was necessary to think old houses to exist for the sake of pictures and romance; but as for people of common sense going to live in them—that was out of the question.

I left her still outside with her eye-glass levelled at the chimneys, and darted into the house to explore. An old woman presented me with a jingling bunch of keys, unlocking all the doors, throwing open the shutters and letting the long lines of sun shine full over the unoccupied rooms. It was all delicious, I thought; the long dining room with its tall windows opening like doors upon the broad gravel walk, the circular drawing-room with its stained-glass roofing, the double flights of winding stairs, the quaint passages, the numerous shallow recesses of all shapes and sizes opening one out of another, and cheeking each other from end to end of the house; and, above all, the charming old rustic balcony, running round the waist of the building like a belt, and carrying one, almost quite as a bird could fly, from one of those dear old pointed windows under the eaves, down amongst the flower-beds below.

I said to myself in my own silful way, "This Thatched House must be my home!" and then I set about casting Aunt Featherstone into a new way of thinking. It was not at all against her will that she completed the purchase at last. Afterwards, however, she liked to think it was so.

In May it was all settled. The house was filled with painters and paper hangers, and all through the long summer months they kept on making a mess within the walls, and forbidding us to enter and enjoy the place in the full glorious luxuriance of its summer beauty. At last, on driving there one bright evening, I found to my joy that the workmen had decamped, leaving the Thatched House clean and fresh and gay, ready for the reception of as and our goods and chattels. Lysang in through one of the open dining-room windows, and began wildly round the floor from pure delight. Pausing at last for breath, I saw the old woman who took care of the place, and who had on my first visit proved my shelters for me and jingled her keys, had entered the room while I danced, and was standing quietly near me from the doorway with a queer expression on her wrinkled face.

"Oh, ha! Nelly," I cried triumphantly, "what do you think of the old house now?"

Nelly shook her grey head, and shut on a satisfied look out of her small black eyes. Then she folded her arms slowly, and gazed all around the room musingly, while she said:

"Ay, Miss Lucy—wealth can do a deal; but there's things it can't do. All that the hand of man may do to make this place wholesome to live in has been done. Dance and sing now, pretty lady—now, while you have the heart and courage. The day'll come when you'd as soon think of stepin' all night on a tombstone as of standin' on this floor alone after sunset."

"Good gracious, Nelly!" I cried, "what do you mean!—Is it possible that there is anything—have you heard or seen—"

"I have heard and seen plenty," was Nelly's curt reply.

Then there, as I was arguing with the little instalment of our household goods, the old woman stood, and I and another word would I wring that evening from her pucker-ed lips. Her words haunted me, and I went home with my mirth considerably subered; and dreamed all night of wandering up and down that long dining room in the dark, and seeing dimly horrible faces grinning at me from the walls. This was only the first shadow of the trouble that came upon us in the Thatched House.

It seemed to degrees in nods and whispers, and stories told in lowered tones by the firside at night. The servants got possession of a rumor, and the rumor reached us. I shuddered in silence, and contrived for the first few months to keep it a jealous secret from my unsuspecting aunt. For the house was ours, and Aunt Featherstone was timorous; and the rumor, very horrible, was this—the Thatched House was haunted.

Haunted, it was said, by a footstep, which every night at a certain hour, went down the principal corridor, distinctly audible as it passed the doors, descended the staircase, traversed the hall, and ceased suddenly at the dining room door. It was a heavy, subdued foot, and walked rather slowly. All the servants could describe it minutely, though none could know that they had positively heard it. New editions of this story were constantly coming out, and found immediate circulation. To each of them was added some fresh harrowing incident, illustrative of the manners and customs of a certain shadowy inhabitant, who was said to have occupied the Thatched House all through the dark days of its past emptiness and desolation, and who resented fiercely the unwelcome advent of us flesh and blood intruders. The tradition of this lonely shade was as follows: The builder and first owner of the Thatched House was an elderly man, wealthy, wicked and feared. He had married a gentle young wife, whose heart had been broken before she consented to give him her hand. He was cruel to her, in a big bar harshly, and leaving her solitary in the lonely house for long winter weeks and months together, till she went and brooded over her sorrows, and died a maniac. Goaded with remorse, he had shut up the house and fled to the country. Soon the different people had finished the beautiful, romantic old dwelling, and made an attempt to live in it; but they said that the sorrowful lady would not yield up her right to any new comer. It had been her habit, when alive, to steal down stairs at night, when she could not sleep for weeping, and in with her own hand fling the doors wringing her hands, till the morning dawned; and now, though her form was laid in the grave, her ghost had been given her tears ought to have been long ago shed. The story went on to say that the sounds of her former wretchedness, but passed the pumps, and trod the stairs, and wept in the hall right after night, as of old. At the dining-room door the step was said to pause; and up and down the dreary hall would wander a wailing ghost was believed to sit, wringing her hands, till the morning dawned.

It was not till the summer had departed that I learned this story.

As long as the sun shone, and the roses bloomed, and the nightingales sang about the windows till midnight, I tried hard to shut my ears to the memory of old Nelly's hint, and look good sure not to mention it to my aunt. If the servants looked mysterious, I would not see them; if they whispered together, it was nothing to me. There was no short a time for the stars to shine but—as the slow darkening of the blue sky at night and the early quickening of flowers and birds and rosy beams at dawn, that there was literally no space for the accommodation of ghosts. So long as the sun shone, I said, the Thatched House was a dwelling of sunshine and sweet odors and bright fancies for me. It was different, however, when a wintry sky closed in around us, when solitary leaves dangled upon shivering boughs, and when the winds began to shudder at the windows all through the long dark nights. Then I took fear to my heart, and wished that I had never seen the Thatched House.

Then it was that my sore became gradually upon to the dreadful murmurs that were rife in the house; then it was that I learned the story of the weeping lady, and of her sorrowful life, and of her sad death. I did not believe, though the thumping of my heart, if I chanced to cross a landing, even by twilight, belied the courage of which I boasted. I forbade the servants to hint at such folly as the existence of ghosts, and warned them at their peril not to let a whisper of the kind disturb my aunt. On the latter point I believe they did their best to obey me.

Aunt Featherstone was a dear old, cross, good-natured, crotchety, kind-hearted lady, who was always needing to be coaxed. She considered herself an exceedingly strong-minded person, whereas she was in reality one of the most nervous women I have ever known. I verily believe that, if she had known that story of the footstep, she would have made up her mind to bear it distractedly every night, and would have been found fainting and stone-dead in her bed with fear. Therefore, as long as it was possible, I kept this secret from her ears. This was easy enough, however, at such shorter space of time than I had imagined it to be.

About the middle of November Aunt Featherstone noticed that I was beginning to look very pale, to lose my appetite, and to start and tremble at the most common place sounds. The truth was that the long sights of terror which passed over my head, in my pretty sleeping room off the ghost's corridor, were wearing out my health and spirits, and threatening to throw me into fever; and yet neither sight nor sound of the supernatural had ever disturbed my rest—some worth remarking, too, for of course, in my paroxysms of wakefulness, I heard a thousand horrible revelations. Night after night I lay in agony, with my ears distended for the sound of the footstep. Morning after morning I awoke weary and jaded, after my night's unrestful sleep, and resolved that I would be cheerfulness to my aunt, and implore her to fly from the place with me. But, when seated at the breakfast-table, my heart inevitably failed me. I succumbed to the mention of a headache, for my pale cheeks, and kept my secret.

How they Know the Yankee.

An American tells this story of his foreign experience:

One day last fall, in company with an eminent clergyman of London, I was making my way toward the Thames Tunnel, when we were stopped by an elegant market-place pictures who seemed to know my companion. "Buy some of these pictures of the public buildings of London, sir," and he, "and you can give them to your American friends when you go home with him."

I was in a hurry, but my wonderment would have delayed me if I had been running to a fire.

"How in creation did you know I was an American?" I asked.

"Way, I couldn't mistake that," the picture-seller replied, with a good laugh, "you are an American all over."

I pressed the picture and then asked him to explain himself.

"I would know by your soft beaver hat," he said. "That is an American fashion. "Well, if it is, why not for that?"

He glanced down at my feet.

"Your boots would betray you. Nobody but Americans wear such boots."

"Well, what then?"

"Your coat and whiskers. Englishmen always wear the mutton-chop style."

"Well, anything more?"

"If you won't be offended, sir!"

"Out with it!"

"Why, my friend," I said, "I have you are the kind of poor cockney we now. Suppose that I wore a stiff, high-crowned hat, sewed into it boots, mutton-chopped whiskers, and had a face as red and shiny as any Britisher would you be able to tell me for an American then?"

"Certainly I should, as soon as I heard you speak," the fellow triumphantly answered. "You Americans invariably commence every sentence with a lie."

My English friend laughed loud and long at his companion's confusion.

"I believe he is more than half right," he said. "Some of your nationality is not detected everywhere you go."

I was seen in Paris. In Paris I was importuned to buy a photograph of Lafayette, because he was "a friend of an American;" in Brussels, a shopkeeper tried to persuade me to exhibit to me the house where Cromwell was born, because he discovered the "finger's great countrymen" and at Amsterdam the clerk was upset by a ragged little descendant of the Pharaohs, who begged me to buy a piece of his donkey—the donkey—that Yankee Jackson had ridden on his triumphal upset, in the city of Washington, U. S. A.

The Pope's Encyclical on Human Liberty.

Different reports are in circulation regarding the length of time devoted by the Pope to the preparation of the encyclical on liberty, which the Monitor published last week. The report that the document was three months in preparation is false. It was an answer to the request made by the episcopal authorities of the various national dioceses to the Holy See, and was prepared by the ecclesiastical doctors of Rome. The Pope who assumes the paternity of these remarks is not one of the chief contributors to the Leo XIII. The Supreme Pontiff is never backward to do anything for a friend, and is even exceptionally slow in issuing an encyclical. It is now about three years since it is rumored that the letter on liberalism occupied His Holiness for two or three years. The decision of the Pope is always final, but he does not adopt any dogmatic decision without consulting others. He is also very difficult in the matter of style, and is fond of collating the thoughts in choice and elegant language. From internal evidence, it is now known that he first drew out a skeleton of his Liberty Encyclical, which, after being carefully pondered, all his notes in the same language. After this part of the work was completed he handed it to his Secretaries, who translated the document into Latin. The translation was then carefully corrected in Latin, and was finally adopted by the Pope as the definitive text. Internal evidence, however, goes to prove that much thought and labor had been bestowed on this marvelous encyclical.

She considered herself an exceedingly strong-minded person, whereas she was in reality one of the most nervous women I have ever known. I verily believe that, if she had known that story of the footstep, she would have made up her mind to bear it distractedly every night, and would have been found fainting and stone-dead in her bed with fear. Therefore, as long as it was possible, I kept this secret from her ears. This was easy enough, however, at such shorter space of time than I had imagined it to be.

About the middle of November Aunt Featherstone noticed that I was beginning to look very pale, to lose my appetite, and to start and tremble at the most common place sounds. The truth was that the long sights of terror which passed over my head, in my pretty sleeping room off the ghost's corridor, were wearing out my health and spirits, and threatening to throw me into fever; and yet neither sight nor sound of the supernatural had ever disturbed my rest—some worth remarking, too, for of course, in my paroxysms of wakefulness, I heard a thousand horrible revelations. Night after night I lay in agony, with my ears distended for the sound of the footstep. Morning after morning I awoke weary and jaded, after my night's unrestful sleep, and resolved that I would be cheerfulness to my aunt, and implore her to fly from the place with me. But, when seated at the breakfast-table, my heart inevitably failed me. I succumbed to the mention of a headache, for my pale cheeks, and kept my secret.

SWINTON'S BIGOTED BOOK

Judge Fallon of Boston Scores its Anti-Catholic Calumnies.

Judge Joseph D. Fallon, of Boston, had the following letter published in the Herald recently, as a stirring reply to a scurrilous attack on Roman Catholic Church. It will meet the hearty approval of the readers of the MONITOR.

To the Editor of the Herald.—I feel it my duty to make a solemn and indignant protest against the abuse, the calumnies, the slanders and the misrepresentations recently uttered and circulated during the past few weeks against the members of the school board of this city, Catholic and non-Catholic. I was present when the meetings recently held at Tremont Temple and Faneuil Hall by people who represented an average Boston audience. These meetings were principally composed of "British-American, so-called, and the Catholics of a certain unprincipled and foul-mouthed preacher, who, I regret to say, finds charger following in cultured Boston than in any other part of this enlightened and extensive country. The presence, however, of a few respectable people, spectators and others, at those meetings is my excuse to the public and to the school board, of which I am a member, for this unsuspecting assault.

Never has the public had less cause for alarm; never has there been less danger of any improper interference with our public schools than at present; never since I have been in the school board, and I have been a member of the school Committee since higher than it does at present, have the moral and intellectual tone of our schools to day are better attended, better taught, better in all those respects which help to make a well-rounded community than ever before. Why, then, this outcry against the school Committee? Why those slander and misrepresentations? The reason is that the Committee displaced a text-book and commenced a new one, and a teacher without just cause. Let us see.

On the 8 of May last a communication was received by the School Committee from Rev. Theodore A. Metcalf charging Mr. Charles H. Travers, a master in the Roxbury High School, with making statements in the course of his lecture one in history grossly insulting not only to the Catholic people of his school, but to every Catholic in the community, and asking for protest in such a repetition of these insults. The communication specifically charged Mr. Travers with of having an injudicious "a very misses to commit sin," and illustrating the charge by asking: "Do you remember he brought before a judge he would only have to put his hand to his pocket and produce a big bar harshly, and leaving her solitary in the lonely house for long winter weeks and months together, till she went and brooded over her sorrows, and died a maniac. Goaded with remorse, he had shut up the house and fled to the country. Soon the different people had finished the beautiful, romantic old dwelling, and made an attempt to live in it; but they said that the sorrowful lady would not yield up her right to any new comer. It had been her habit, when alive, to steal down stairs at night, when she could not sleep for weeping, and in with her own hand fling the doors wringing her hands, till the morning dawned; and now, though her form was laid in the grave, her ghost had been given her tears ought to have been long ago shed. The story went on to say that the sounds of her former wretchedness, but passed the pumps, and trod the stairs, and wept in the hall right after night, as of old. At the dining-room door the step was said to pause; and up and down the dreary hall would wander a wailing ghost was believed to sit, wringing her hands, till the morning dawned.

It was not till the summer had departed that I learned this story.

As long as the sun shone, and the roses bloomed, and the nightingales sang about the windows till midnight, I tried hard to shut my ears to the memory of old Nelly's hint, and look good sure not to mention it to my aunt. If the servants looked mysterious, I would not see them; if they whispered together, it was nothing to me. There was no short a time for the stars to shine but—as the slow darkening of the blue sky at night and the early quickening of flowers and birds and rosy beams at dawn, that there was literally no space for the accommodation of ghosts. So long as the sun shone, I said, the Thatched House was a dwelling of sunshine and sweet odors and bright fancies for me. It was different, however, when a wintry sky closed in around us, when solitary leaves dangled upon shivering boughs, and when the winds began to shudder at the windows all through the long dark nights. Then I took fear to my heart, and wished that I had never seen the Thatched House.

Then it was that my sore became gradually upon to the dreadful murmurs that were rife in the house; then it was that I learned the story of the weeping lady, and of her sorrowful life, and of her sad death. I did not believe, though the thumping of my heart, if I chanced to cross a landing, even by twilight, belied the courage of which I boasted. I forbade the servants to hint at such folly as the existence of ghosts, and warned them at their peril not to let a whisper of the kind disturb my aunt. On the latter point I believe they did their best to obey me.

Aunt Featherstone was a dear old, cross, good-natured, crotchety, kind-hearted lady, who was always needing to be coaxed. She considered herself an exceedingly strong-minded person, whereas she was in reality one of the most nervous women I have ever known. I verily believe that, if she had known that story of the footstep, she would have made up her mind to bear it distractedly every night, and would have been found fainting and stone-dead in her bed with fear. Therefore, as long as it was possible, I kept this secret from her ears. This was easy enough, however, at such shorter space of time than I had imagined it to be.

About the middle of November Aunt Featherstone noticed that I was beginning to look very pale, to lose my appetite, and to start and tremble at the most common place sounds. A Howling Orangeman.

The people of Humboldt county, in this State, have our deep sympathy in the disgrace which they must feel at having in their midst an anti American Orange Lodge, and a howling Orangeman who recently delivered himself of a most disgusting diatribe of abuse against the Catholic Church.

The occasion which brought together a few fanatical Scotchmen, Welsh Britons, Orangemen and bigots of that undesirable ilk, was the celebration of the Battle of the Boyne, an episode in Irish history that has left a trail of sorrow in its wake which have occurred almost on every anniversary.

Men who celebrate the Battle of the Boyne are not Americans. They generally consist of the scum of Orange Lodges in Ireland from whence they have migrated far more for their country's good than to be of any benefit to the land that gives them shelter.

The impious, ignorant imbecile who made the attack on the Catholic Church to which we allude, should be arraigned before the next Grand Jury of Humboldt county as a disturber of the public peace, for his hatred of men of law is calculated to arouse the worst passions of men and to plunge a peaceable community into religious strife.

Passing over all the Orange twaddle which this Britain lago belched forth against the Catholic Church, we will merely allude to a few of the lesser lies in his long tissue of falsehood.

This backwoods bible banger is so utterly ignorant of even eminent men residing for years in his State, that he spits his spleen at Archbishop Riordan and Bishop Mora by styling them "Irish" (!!!) All the other "arguments" of that genuine Knownothing are, in intelligence, on a par with this assertion, hence we dismiss the pusillanimous preacher with the hope that Humboldt county may numerous be disgraced by having another installment of anti-Catholic intolerance from the same sectarian source.

—A correspondent in the Sandwich Islands informs us that Rev. George Wallace recently preached a discourse in that place, during which he endeavored to prove the antiquity of the English Church. Among other interesting facts he stated that recently a lease of land for 999 years to the British Crown expired in England, and the property reverted without question to the English Church as the original lessor. We have no doubt about the lease for 999 years having expired, but we will wager a keg of California wine against a bunch of bananas that the property did not belong to the Protestant Church of England 999 years ago. Henry VIII. founded the Anglican Church (old Scratch was in it, they say), and as that wife murdering wretch went out of the world in 1547, it is scarcely necessary to say that a lease for 999 years would extend back to the year 849, a period of the world when the word Protestant was unknown. If the English Church took any lands recently on the expiration of a 999 years lease, it must be charged with being a receiver of stolen Catholic goods, as that Protestant corporation had no more right to much land that it has to hundreds of churches and thousands of acres of land which it stole from the Catholic Church during the ruthless and robbery which marked the Reformation in England, Ireland and Scotland. The Rev. Wallace is "away off" in his history, and we commend him to a course of Macaulay before he opens his mouth again on this subject.

—The late Emperor Frederick must be added to the list of those great souls who, like Gordon, though not having the happiness of belonging to the Catholic Church, yet have found their chief consolation in that most Catholic of books, the "Imitation of Christ." In a letter from San Remo, addressed to his private chaplain, and just published, he writes of Queen Victoria (he then was) wrote: "You are right in speaking of patience and resignation. For me loss and sorrow don's suit; life is the Divine decree, it would not be easy to bear such a manner of life as it at present laid upon me. I am, of course, kept up by the loving care of my wife and surrounded by my children. But to have to remain so long away from home, especially considering the danger of my arrival before the next Grand Jury of Humboldt county as a disturber of the public peace, for his hatred of men of law is calculated to arouse the worst passions of men and to plunge a peaceable community into religious strife.

Passing over all the Orange twaddle which this Britain lago belched forth against the Catholic Church, we will merely allude to a few of the lesser lies in his long tissue of falsehood.

POPE ADRIAN'S BULL.

Proof that Giraldus Cambrensis Knew it Was a Forged Document—His Epithets and Slanderous Sarcasm on Bulls. The "Agnus et Cauda" Critically Analyzed—More of Judge Magrath's Mistakes Made Manifest.

We will now revert to our readers another action of Giraldus Cambrensis, which will serve to show that he himself knew that the Bull attributed to Pope Adrian was a forgery. Giraldus says:

"At this Synod the Pope's Legate presided, St. Gelasius, the Primate of Ireland, having refused to attend."

Those paragraphs are all right, save that the Bull of Pope Adrian (it is strong: the year (1171) is issued; the "arming" of King Henry a bad bull; the Synod of "Cashell" is a myth; and the whole matter a mere lodging fiction manufactured by English writers in order to cover up King Henry's iniquitous invasion of Ireland! So far from being "armed with these Bulls," as Judge Magrath stupidly asserts, the bogus documents were lying (in far more senses than one) in some dark corner of Winchester Castle, ready to be removed into the light as soon as the parties whose names were forged thereto had "shuffled off this mortal coil." A pretty extensive reading of Irish history in connection with this question, justifies us in boldly asserting that no Conference of the Irish Hierarchy or Clergy was held in "Cashell" on October 18th, 1171. Her. P. J. Carew, in his "Ecclesiastical History of Ireland," says that the Synod at which the bogus Bulls were for the first time publicly read in Ireland, was in the year 1175, and he mentions Waterford as the place.

In the Appendix to his work, Father Carew has given a list of the "Principal Synods held in Ireland before the Thirteenth Century." This list is copied from Lanigan's History, and the only Synods mentioned from 1162 to 1172 are the following.

1170 Synod of Armagh. This Synod decreed that all was English who were desired to settle in Ireland, should be restored to liberty.

1172. Synod of Cashel, by order of Henry II., convened for the purpose regulating some matters of ecclesiastical discipline.

Judge Magrath's statement concerning the Synod of October 18th, 1171, will have to be added therefore, to the other numerous "mistakes" for which his Honor is becoming daily more notorious.

Thomas Moore in his History of Ireland, also gives the year 1175 as the date when the manipulated manuscripts first saw the sunlight of Ireland fall upon their fabulous faces. This writer thus describes the manner of their introduction:

"It was about this time (c. c. 1175) that the Bull of Pope Adrian, granting the kingdom of Ireland to Henry II., and obtained by his Sovereign by the Holy See as for back as the year 1155, was drawn from its obscurity and produced to the world, with a long train of other Papal documents, all purporting to be addressed to Ireland, and all tending to the same purpose, namely, the enforcement of the Papal Bull of Ireland to Henry II. and the enforcement of the Papal authority in Ireland. Of the genuineness of the Bull of Adrian, and of the authenticity of the other documents, we have no other evidence than the Bull itself, and the circumstances of its being produced at the time when it was said to have been found, are such as to create a strong suspicion against the whole transaction. The Bull of Adrian had, indeed, been long known to the Irish Ecclesiastical body. We now turn to the "History of Ireland" by Sister Mary Francis Clare, popularly known as "the Nun of Kenmare," whom Judge Magrath vain gloriously alludes to as one of the Irish historians. She "utterly scoffs at the genuineness of the Adrian Bull" but in this regard, as in a great many other matters in her bad book, Judge Magrath misjudges this author's opinions from a random foot note. If the careless author of "Ireland and the Pope" had opened the Nun of Kenmare's work at page 269, he would have saved us the trouble of exposing his shallowness, as therein he would have read the following opinion of that estimable Sister, upon the favorable Letter which King Henry gave to Dermod MacMorrough, by which he sold the English monarch for help to remunate him in his Irish possessions:

"The royal letter ran thus: "Henry, King of England, Duke of Normandy and Aquitain, and Earl of Anjou, to all his liegemen, English, Scotch, Welsh and Norman, and to all the sea those under his dominion, sends greeting. As many as know that I have received Dermot into my lord, know that Dermot, Prince of Leister, has been received into the bosom of our great Sovereign Lord, Henry the Second, King of England, Duke of Normandy and Aquitain, and Earl of Anjou, and that he has given to him his land of Leinster, with all his rights, by the hands of his liege lord, and that whoever of our subjects in our territories, shall be willing to lend aid to Dermot, our prince and faithful and liege subject, let such person know that we do hereby grant to him for said purpose our favor and favor."

—Commenting on this Letter, the Nun of Kenmare says

"It is evident then is not even the semblance of truth in the Bull of Adrian, conferring the island of Ireland on Henry, although the Pope's Legate presided at the Synod at which it was said to have been found. The character of the Bull of Adrian is, in fact, sufficiently stigmatized by the following extract from that Synod:

"Thus ill News troubled the King beyond all Measure; and entered him to hasten his return out of Ireland. The Citizs of Waterford he left in the Custody of Robert Fitz Bernard, and Bishop Anto Hugh de Lacy. Robert Fitz Stephens, Maghee Fitz Henry and Raymond David were in a sort restrained, and to remain at Dublin with Lacy. Before his Departure from Dublin he gave order that Hugh de Lacy his Inheritance of all Meath, to hold of him at Fifty Kight Fees, and each John de Courcey he gave all Ulster if he could conquer it.

"A. D. 1173 When the Kyngs had taken possession of the Ancient Palace of Tara, which was in Waterford, where he unbraized, and arrived at Portlinan in Wales, haite a League from St David's, and in his Company Milo de Cogan, whom he carryed with hym out of Ireland, and from thence with all possible Expedition he passed through England, and so into Normandie."

Here we find that the only allusion to "Cashell" is that King Henry, being in the province of Munster in 1172, the Archbishop of "Cashell" paid him a visit. There was no Synod, therefore, or assembly this chronicler also was being in that period would have mentioned it, as it was an assemblage of the Irish Ecclesiastical body.

We now turn to the "History of Ireland" by Sister Mary Francis Clare, popularly known as "the Nun of Kenmare," whom Judge Magrate vain gloriously alludes to as one of the Irish historians. She "utterly scoffs at the genuineness of the Adrian Bull" but in this regard, as in a great many other matters in her bad book, Judge Magrath misjudges this author's opinions from a random foot note. Farm and Home.

THE QUEEN OF THE HOUSEHOLD.

Flowers spring to bloom where she walks The careful ways of duty; Our hard, cold lines of life with her Are flowing curves of beauty.

Our homes are cheerier for her sake, Our hearts more full of kindness, And all about her seems to invite Her quiet step and caress.

Unspoken benefits of peace Her daily life is spreading; The still refreshment of the day Is her benevolent breathing.

And never toiler bent his back Unlike the lover of idleness; Her portrait to the idle man's eye Hers stands in their trailing.

Her presence lends it warmth and health To all who come before it, It warms just as kindly, fresh And as silent rather as the sun.

And if the husband or the wife In home's strong light discovers Such slight defective as failed to meet The blinded eye of lovers,

Why need we care to ask? - who dreams Without their throw of roses, Or wonders if all the truest steel The smallest spark discloses?

For still in natural influence Lies the secret of true living; Love alone is love that never knows The sweetness of forgiving.

- F. G. WHITTIER.

Clever Irishwomen.

The "Madge" of "Girl's Gossip" in Mr. Labouchere's London Truth, is Mrs. O. J. Humphreys, a middle aged Irishwoman, who also writes much for various other papers.

Mrs Emily Crawford, the Paris journalist, is an Irishwoman, who remembers, as a child, being carried about on O'Connell's chariolers. She has a strong, handsome face, blue eyes, full of merriment and anfame, heavy black lashes and very abundant white hair, which she wears with extreme simplicity. She is a brilliant woman and an always interesting talker, full of wit and anecdote, never at a loss for a word, and without a speck of malice in her composition. She has extraordinary health and strength, and a beautiful unconsciousness of herself that is extremely taking. In a calm filled with beautiful women, and clever women, the statesman and the wits instantly gravitate in her direction. She is so good-humored, so amusing and so natural; a quick witted Celt by birth, a Parisian by education, and a good woman from principle—surely this is a happy combination.

Mrs. J. H. Riddel, one of the most charming of living novelists, is a cousin of Carlyle's. Her father was High Sheriff for the county Antrim, and soon after his death she went to London to have a struggle for fame. The battle was badly fought, but success crowned her efforts. She threw in a charmingly quaint cottage in Upper Halloway, not far from the Thames where she passes her leisure in cultivating her garden and raising quantities of fowls.

The Fashions.

The most elegant imported parasols are devoid of lace garniture, and are made of pretty cotton, silk, muslin, and silk mixed.

Wide ties are still growing fashion for round waists and their stylish belt advantage, bonbon and sleeve are in great demand.

Tan shoes are very generally worn both by men and women. With the latter, however, they seldom harmonize with the costumes, and, as a contrast, are not a success.

A French fashion writer, intent on enlightening general ignorance, imparts the grave information that it is bad form to wear a bonnet, however elegant, with a low cut corsage.

Recitations of pretty and effective poems and other short poems have become of late a popular form of entertainment at afternoon and evening parties, and is one that is especially suited to ladies.

—Among the late importations are exceedingly pretty 3 o'clock tea cloths, very delicately flowered, the more outlines of the flowers being worked in Chinese washing silks—pale pink or pale blue on a China silk ground of white or cream color.

—Maiden hair fern leaves, ivy, rose petals and a little cresson or pale olive green velvet are used to decorate the summer bonnets of tucked silk muslin or shirred tulle. Cream white is used instead of blue white for both net and silk muslin bonnets.

—The bare pins of enameled gold in pretty flower devices, delicate and dainty in pattern, being only large enough to catch together the airy folds of lace or mull at the throat, are much more fashionable than the heavier bar pins that have been popular so long.

Farm Notes.

—Care should be taken not to over drive horses during the summer; with sure and frequent watering a much greater distance can be covered without injury; but the most careful and matters judgment in a driver is necessary to make long, forced drives without injury to horses during hot weather.

—It is essential that young stock be kept steadily growing through the entire season, and, as the pastures gradually fail, feeding should commence before the animals begin to grow thin, as much loss will result from the attempt to give them a new start after they once begin to fail.

—The best time for dehorning is soon after the horns start growing; there is less pain and less risk at this time than later. The only possible objection to dehorning is on the score of cruelty, and experience will convince the most skeptical that it is less cruel than, to allow the animal to grow three weapons of injury to other stock with which they are pressed up.

Honey Biscuit.

—SOUR MILK BISCUIT.—One quart of flour, two level tablespoonfuls of soda, two large tablespoonfuls of lard, two cupfuls of sour milk. Mix with the hand as bread dough, only not so stiff. Roll out about an inch, cut and bake in a moderate oven.

—RICE BISCUIT.—Half cup pounded rice in enough milk to dissolve all the grains, adding it, boiling, salt to sheerhold. Sift four pounds of flour in a pan and mix this poor the rice and milk, adding salt and a large wineglass of yeast; knead and let rise until light. Bake into loaves and bake.

—During the winter the relative value of bran, oatmeal and other by-fodders to supplement coarse feeds, are being necessarily learned. Farmers are acquiring the many recently-developed principles of feeding, how to construct food rations, the injury and loss of one-sided feeds etc.

How to Cure a Cold.

The following instructions if properly carried out will cure the most obstinate cold, and comes to us highly recommended by a reader of the Monitor:

Fill a basin with boiling water, put into it one or more tablespoonfuls of turpentine, and before the steam escapes, cover the face and head with a large cloth and inhale the fumes of the steam as long as can possibly be done. It will be very trying to stand the strong odor of the turpentine, but if this baby feeling is conquered you will whether in the head or chest will instantly be cured. The progress may be repeated as often as desired, but usually beneficial effects are felt immediately after the inhalations. It is advisable to keep out of the way of draughts and cold after trying the cure.

Changing His Shirt.

A Frenchman travelling by railway in England was very anxious to change his shirt in order to make a visit after the train had arrived at its destination, without taking the trouble to go to a hotel. He guide-book indicated a tunnel on the road, and he asked the guard how long the train would be in the tunnel. The guard mistook the question, and supposing he asked how long before the train would reach the tunnel, replied briefly, "Half an hour." The carriage in which the Frenchman was traveling contained several ladies and gentlemen. The traveler got down his valise, unlocked it, and made everything ready for a change of apparel while they would be in the tunnel. As soon as they entered it he pulled off his shirt and prepared to put on a clean one, but imagine his surprise on discovering that the train remained three minutes in the tunnel instead of thirty! As they came out into open daylight, he was standing in the middle of a condition quite unfit for a mixed company of ladies and gentlemen.

INDULGENCES.

Plain Truth from a Protestant

CATHOLIC AUTHORITIES CITED.

The Whole Question in a Nut-Shell.

The following candid article concerning Indulgences was compiled and written by a Protestant minister whose Christian consciousness rebelled against the rebuke of his bigoted brethren in the school of sectarianism. The Monitor fervently hopes that it will be carefully read and remembered by all those blatant bigots on this Coast who are constantly crying out that an Indulgence means a license to commit sin. The author, Rev. Robert Court, D. D., wrote this excellent explanation of Indulgences for the Morning Times of Lowell, Massachusetts.

What is an Indulgence! Men who ought to know better have thus defined it: A license granted, for money, by Roman Catholic ecclesiastics, to people who desire to commit sin, that they may do so with impunity. In shorter phrase it is called "leave to commit sin."

Roman Catholic divines deny this, but still the false statement appears now and again in print. Some one to convert me of falsehood sent me a sermon preached by a converted Catholic. Perhaps it is the view stated above. In order to disabuse myself and give information to such as have been asking of me in private whether I was not in error, let me state my own humble resources, quote a few authorities, both Roman Catholic and Protestant, as to the real doctrine concerning indulgences.

ROMAN CATHOLIC AUTHORITIES.

The Council of Trent.—The Council asserts that the power of conferring indulgences was given by Christ to the Church, that she has always used this power, that the use of indulgences, as being most salutary, is to be retained in the Church, that those who condemned by the Council who say that indulgences are useless, or who say that Church has no power of granting them. In granting them moderation is to be observed, lest Church discipline be enervated. Abuses are to be reformed. All evil gains are to be abolished. (Other abuses than those in popularly prohibited, are to be reported in the Pontifical Synod, by the Bishop), reported by the other Bishops in the Synod and referred to the Pope; "that thus the gift of holy indulgences may be dispensed to all the faithful, piously, holily and incorruptly." (Session xxv., Chap. 21. Water-worth's translation, page 777.) In Session xxiv., Chap. 9, it is decreed that "these heavenly treasures of the Church are not unfruitful, not for poison, but for Godliness."

Catechism of Trent.—The Catechism gives full account of the sacrament of Penance and insists upon satisfaction as a part of that sacrament, but does not treat of indulgences. Satisfaction is given after the sin is pardoned.

The Rescripts.—I quote from "The Official translation," London, 1867, approved by rescript of Pius IX. Indulgences are divided into partial and plenary. A partial indulgence remits so much temporal penalty "as he would have had imposed on him if all by the penitential canons of the Church." Plenary are, of course, full remission of all temporal punishment. To gain an indulgence one should be in a state of grace living in the genus of God, for whomever is in the guilt of mortal sin and exposed to the eternal penalty, cannot receive remission of the temporal penalty. He must make at least an act of true contrition, besides doing the work prescribed on condition for receiving the indulgence. To gain a plenary indulgence one must detest even venial sins and lay aside even affection to all such sins in general, as well as to each in particular. This is the highest teaching in the Church of Rome as to indulgences. It is evident that here is intended no encouragement to sin, whatever may be supposed to be the tendency.

Compendium of Indulgences.—From the Instructions on Canon Law, for the use of the great Seminary of St. Sulpice, Paris, published at Paris in 1880, we learn that this compendium was instituted by Clement IX. in 1669 (that it has a family to dispose of every doubt and difficulty in respect to indulgences, to correct and amend abuses, to prohibit the printing of a false apocryphal or false indulgence, to take suppressed indulgences and examine those that are printed; that they are to explain as well as examine all those already published, and if they find necessary, having consulted the Pope, to abolish them.

Gousset.—The Cardinal Archbishop of Rheims, in moral theology, gives a full and rather eloquent account of indulgences in his "Theologia Moralis," vol. 2, p. 506, Paris, 1855. His definition is full and clear. "The remission of the temporal punishment which remains for the sin remitted cannot be subject to, for the faithi which, as to guilt and eternal punishment have had forgiven him, indulgences remits neither venial nor mortal sins."

Wiseman.—His learned Cardinal, in a pastoral letter published in the London Tablet, June 17th 1854, says: "Many persons will be inclined to incredulity when I tell them that an indulgence is no pardon for sin of any sort, past, present or future. It is no more than a remission by the Church, in virtue of the keys, of a portion, or the whole, of the temporal punishment due to sin."

The Dogwhim.—The Compendium for examination of candidates for the priesthood, issued by the highest authority, Paris, 1874, has the following, page 568: "It is objected that this doctrine, I, overthrows the foundation of contrition, 2, promotes immunity for sin. In response, the antecedent is denied—that, in the grounds for the objection.

1 Because an indulgence is given to contrite persons, 2 Because the satisfaction of the man to whom the indulgence is granted is supplied by the satisfactions of the saints, out of the mercy of God."

The Jesuits.—Defamer Catechism is used in this country. The edition I quote from is that of New York, 1829, approved by Cardinals Wiseman and McCloskey. The definition is substantially that already given. Repentance and the doing of the good works prescribed are declared the conditions of obtaining indulgences, the assertion that the Church forgives sin, by indulgences, or grants indulgence for money, is pronounced "a gross calumny."

Bergier.—Indulgence, remission of the temporal punishment due to sin. This notion of the indulgence supposes that when the sinner has obtained from God, by the sacrament of Penance, the remission of the eternal punishment, the punishment of hell, he is still obliged to satisfy divine justice by a temporal punishment. Bergier goes on to show that the granting of indulgences belongs to the Pope and Bishops. He asserts that the indulgence serve as a stay the penitent from a restitution or reparation, that the sin make, and never was there a cause so ignorant and corrupt as to dispense with that. Bergier admits, as does the Council of Trent, that abuses had crept in, but he pointedly says:

"Shall we therefore, on account of abuses, reject the good? Shall we, because some have made a bad use of the most salutary indulgences, deprive the rest of the faithful of the great advantage of gaining them

Poetry.

[FOR THE MONITOR.]

"Friendship! mysterious cement of the soul;
Sweetest of life and noblest of society,
I owe thee much."—St. Pierre—"The Hermit."

Give me a few true friends whose order grows not cold
When frosts appear and life is wasting old;
Whose constancy by contact with my own,
Increases as each layer of years has flown.
Only a few I ask. I would inspect
The victim to them of a friendly heart,
And bind them closely to me that I may Preserve them like some exquisite bouquet
Of choicest flowers.

If in some fatal hour,
Shadd wither one disconsolate sweet flower,
Still would I prize the withed and dead leaves,
For Love is strong and Faith always believes;
Neglecting not the petals drooped and dear,
They would receive the shrine of my tear—
Who loved the perfume in Life's summer day,
Should grieve the flower from whence 'twas flown away!

C. ANTHONY DOYLE.

THE INVISIBLE.

"If there is naught but what we see,
What is the wild world worth to me?
But is there naught save what we see?
* * *
"If there is naught but what we see,
The friend I loved is lost to me:
His fall asleep: who dares to say
His spirit is no far away?
Who knows what wings are round about?
These thoughts—who proves not from without
They still are whispered? Who can think
They rise from mortality's foul and drink?
These thoughts that stream on like the sea,
And darkly hint immortality
The best of some great hope, and break,
And only broken glimmers make,
Nor seem climb the skies, to lie
And calmly mirror the far sky,
And image forth in tranquil deeps
The secret that its silence keeps.

"Because he never comes, and stands
And stretches out to me both hands,
Because he never leans before
The pale, when I set with the door
At morning, nor is ever found
Just at my side when I turn round,
Half thinking I shall meet his eye,
From watching the broad moon glide rise—
For all this shall I hoarage pay
To Death, great end of heart, and say:
'He perished, and has ceased to be;
Another comes, but never he!
Yet, by our wond'rous being, say!
Although his face I never see
Through all the infinite To Be,
I know he lives and cares for me.'

EDWARD ROWLAND SILL.

MARGRET.

AN IRISH LOVE LYRIC.

I.

Her trembling hands were clasped in mine; the rain of summer
Lay like a tangled wickery within her tresses dark-brown;
Her face was marvelly, sweetly pale, and soft as dovelets be,
The dark brown locks that crowned her head
were beautiful to see;
Twas midnight's solemn and solemn hour—the hour
when first I told
My tale of love to willing ears, and it was the year of gold;
And now the young moline that played around her mirthful mouth—
The tempting lips of Margaret, the lily of the South!

II.

She spoke few words; but from her eyes a tender dove spoke—
A nothing balm that woke my heart to love's divine delight!
An silent self-confessing pledge that somehow seemed to say:
"Hope stands, awaiting you and me within the gates of day!"
She gazed up at my pleading face so pensively
that she Looked like a shadowy vision come to greet me from the sea—
A fair young Naiad tripping a'er an iridescent
strand—
An angel from the starry skies—a fay from fairy land!

III.

Within the valse of Monator you might travel
where you will,
And see the flowers blooming at the feet of every sad hill,
Where Magnetism freezes on the plains, where Kamaur river flows,
Where winter sheds on Tantlab's head its snow-
white mantle,
Lorne's waters play—
You could not find so rich a gem a lustre indeed pure!
Is Margaret, my own true love, my winsome
Irish girl!

IV.

The sophy, that at eve's decline steals over Glamorgan,
Hath not the fragrance of her breath, and can not be as pure!
The white-robed dreams, that o'er the brain of hard or poet roll,
Are not more glorious than the thoughts that camp within her soul!
The joy round the tower that clings night typify
her love,
And, oh! her faith is Mamon's balm that falleth from above.
Ah! could this harp but sing her praise through out each summer long,
Her should it still be only theme—the mistress of my song.

V.

O pensive, charming Irish maid! in mem'ry's lovely shrine
I'll guard the image of thy face, those pensive eyes of mine,
The dewy softness of thy cheeks, the flower from thy hand
Then gently and so tenderly beside Atlantic's strand!
My heart will throb responsively to fancy's mystic frame
Whene'er I'll murmur through the night the sweet name of thy name!
Oh, let me see those smiles once more around thy angelic mouth,
And let me call thee, Margaret, my lily of the South!

"VALISKA."

A Catholic Story of Temptation, and Triumph over Evil.

[WRITTEN FOR THE MONITOR BY "BRILLOS."]

CHAPTER I.

In a retired spot in central Arizona, locked in by lofty chains of mountains and surrounded by tall sahuaras (a species of cactus) stands the village of V——, lonely spot indeed it seemed to a lone-spaed, and faced girl of some fifteen summers, who stood on a hill-top overlooking the town, gazing at the gorgeous sunset hues which lit up the hills with their solar alchemy, added a new charm to the grandeur of the lofty peaks beyond, and softened the ruggedness of their jagged points.

But not of the glory of the sunset was Valiska thinking. Bitter thoughts raged in her heart, pride and anger marred the beauty of the large tear-dimmed eyes, as she thought of her wrongs—for wrongs she convinced herself she suffered.

She had just rushed out of the lonely cot she called her home to escape the reproaches he poed upon her by her guardian, for Valiska Merritt was motherless and was left in the care of a grandaint, who, at least, was not really unkind to her, yet the girl's great fault was pride and her nature would not brook the taunts of her guardian, who, when angered, used harsh words to her charge. It was after having an encounter with her aunt that we find Valiska then. Sitting alone on the hill-top, her soft curly hair tossed wildly about her face, as her rebellious feelings thus sought expression.

"I hate her! I will not stay with her when I am of age," panted the girl. "Oh, the horror of it all! The world's wide and so am, I can never forget."

For the aunt was not whose in her language and the girl's proud, refined nature shunk from the old woman who taunted her about having to support her. Tom Valiska, who was high tempered, would answer her saucily, and slam at intvariably received blows from the irate old woman before it ended.

"Way," she sobbed from her lonely seat on the hill, "why have I to bear all this. I cannot! I will not! It is merciful and just, and, yes, I am as one of His child rem, must bear injustice, and for what? It cause I am dependent on my aunt. Yes! and she makes me feel it, too." While she was nursing her woes and hating her old aunt with all her angry, little heart, she heard voices in the flat and raising her head saw a dark-eyed, gentle girl, hurrying toward her, and not wishing to be found in her tears, she crept, "I'd die on the way, I will never touch another crust of her bread," and Valiska went into the little shed-room, which she occupied, her mind intent upon gathering up what few articles she could really call her own, and go from the place she hated.

But where was she to go, she had forgotten, her uncle Thomas and her sisters, and they lived some distance from V——, up on the river. Rosrde was in town on a visit to some relatives. Yes, she knew they would receive her, she would go to them and tell them she had left her aunt never to return; so she packed up what few things she had and prepared to start. It was a glorious summer night, and as she stood among out on the silent moonlit world, she thought of her mother, and wondered if she would have been a different girl, if she had lived. She turned to take a last look at the room she was about to leave forever, and her eyes rested on a prayer-book which had belonged to her mother. She took it up and tears dimmed her eyes, as she turned over the pages. Finally she came to a blessed picture which had been unperceived in its page. She took it out and looked at it intently. It was a pic ure of the Crucifixion. As she gazed on the agonized face, she thought, why did I murmur at my lot—I, a poor sinner, when Christ, my Redeemer, suffered so much! Shall I shrink from suffering, when He, who is sinless, did so without a murmur? "No, no," she said, falling on her knees, with the picture still in her hand. "Suffering Saviour," she prayed, "help me to bear my trials, give me humility," and leaning her head on the low window sill, she wept and thought over it all. She recalled her rash determinent to run away and tried to think kindly of her aunt, to be grateful for her care during the years she had been under her charge. The Tempter tried to vanquish this gentle spirit of alms-giving which had taken great possession of her portrait and, and whispered, "you owe your aunt nothing, she has been cruel and brutal to you. leave her; make your own way in the world, there are many ways to do it." "Get thee hence," whispered the temptor, "see!—you can earn a living by it; you can go on the stage; in many, many ways you can make an easy living for yourself.

But Valiska fastened her eyes and her thoughts on the picture of the crucified Redeemer, and prayed for strength to overcome the temptations which assailed her. And there during the long, lonely night she prayed for power and humility, to bear the stinging reproaches heaped upon her by her hard-hearted relative.

At times Valiska was very unruly and petulant, and the old lady allowed her anger to gain mastery over her and a torrent of abuse was poured upon the girl which served to irritate her proud, rebellious spirit instead of teaching her the much needed lesson of humility and obedience. If the old lady understood her better and used different means to bring her to submission, it might have been different. As Valiska grew to feel that she was more bitterly wronged than was really the case, and though her natural piety, stifled, served to much her, still her unbending disposition, her determination of a rebuke, even when mildly administered, seemed to be gaining an ascendancy over her better nature.

Not even the gentle counsels of her friend, Rosrdo, could make her swerve from the idea that her grand aunt was unjust, as truth she was, but Valiska had been sorry and disobedient at times, and when her anger was raging, did not stop to think that she was partly in fault, even though her conscience told her so. Her proud nature would not let her acknowledge it.

Thus things went on until the girl was in her seventeenth year, nearly a woman in years, but a child in knowledge of the world and its ways. Her aunt died and she was left alone, sole mistress of the cottage, with no one but herself and her old grand uncle to care for.

Valiska wept bitterly when her poor old relative was laid away, and tried to forget her unhappy past and remember all the kindness her aunt had done her in her childhood.

She thought her old uncle comfortable as she could, for he could not work steadily and was at home most of the time, and kept the house in order. She began to realize that she was no longer a child; that she had to face the world and earn a living for both, as her uncle would soon be unable to do anything. But how was she to do it? She was not strong enough to do hard work, and, she, she had not been very studious during her aunt's life time, and she knew the little income left them would not last forever. She must do something, it was plain, and she was handy with her needle, and the neighbors, glad to help her, gave her some sewing which was the means of helping her to keep out of debt and earn a frugal living. Then when night came she folded away her work and took out her books to study. A desire to make up for the time she had lost in the past had taken possession of her, and study she did, long and diligently, and during the long summer nights she pored over her books anxious to improve herself.

So for things had gone call with Valiska alone her aunt's death, but she was soon to have another chance to gain a victory over herself, for there had moved to V——, a family in which were several grown daughters, who seemed to be very nice girls, but upon close acquaintance, proved themselves to be rude and unladylike, and it was not long before they and Valiska were on friendly terms, much to the disgust of Sorrida Matthews, who loved Valiska, and was pained to think she would be seen in such constant companionship with them, particularly the oldest girl, Hetalie, who was not well thought of, and of whom Valiska knew nothing, else she would have dropped her company, and she knows the truth. Hetalie Valiska was beautiful and showed her best side to Valiska, who was a passionate worshipper of loveliness. Sorrida came and tried to draw her away from one whom she feared would cause her to be wrongly judged.

Very timidly she broached the subject to Valiska, who was talking excitedly about the beauty and sweetness of her friend.

"I will go," she cried, "if I die on the way, I will never touch another crust of her bread," and Valiska went into the little shed-room, which she occupied, her mind intent upon gathering up what few articles she could really call her own, and go from the place she hated.

But where was she to go, she had forgotten her uncle Thomas and her sisters, and they lived some distance from V——, up on the river. Rosrde was in town on a visit to some relatives. Yes, she knew they would receive her, she would go to them and tell them she had left her aunt never to return; so she packed up what few things she had and prepared to start. It was a glorious summer night, and as she stood among out on the silent moonlit world, she thought of her mother, and wondered if she would have been a different girl, if she had lived. She turned to take a last look at the room she was about to leave forever, and her eyes rested on a prayer-book which had belonged to her mother. She took it up and tears dimmed her eyes, as she turned over the pages. Finally she came to a blessed picture which had been unperceived in its page. She took it out and looked it it intently. It was a pic ure of the Crucifixion. As she gazed on the agonized face, she thought, why did I murmur at my lot—I, a poor sinner, when Christ, my Redeemer, suffered so much! Shall I shrink from suffering, when He, who is sinless, did so without a murmur? "No, no," she said, falling on her knees, with the picture still in her hand. "Suffering Saviour," she prayed, "help me to bear my trials, give me humility," and leaning her head on the low window sill, she wept and thought over it all. She recalled her rash determinent to run away and tried to think kindly of her aunt, to be grateful for her care during the years she had been under her charge. The Tempter tried to vanquish this gentle spirit of almsgaiso which had taken great possession of her portrait and, and whispered, "you owe your aunt nothing, she has been cruel and brutal to you. leave her; make your own way in the world, there are many ways to do it." "Get thee hence," whispered the temptor, "see!—you can earn a living by it; you can go on the stage; in many, many ways you can make an easy living for yourself.

But Valiska fastened her eyes and her thoughts on the picture of the crucified Redeemer, and prayed for strength to overcome the temptations which assailed her. And there during the long, lonely night she prayed for power and humility, to bear the stinging reproaches heaped upon her by her hard-hearted relative.

At times Valiska was very unruly and petulant, and the old lady allowed her anger to gain mastery over her and a torrent of abuse was poured upon the girl which served to irritate her proud, rebellious spirit instead of teaching her the much needed lesson of humility and obedience. If the old lady understood her better and used different means to bring her to submission, it might have been different. As Valiska grew to feel that she was more bitterly wronged than was really the case, and though her natural piety, stifled, served to much her, still her unbending disposition, her determination of a rebuke, even when mildly administered, seemed to be gaining an ascendancy over her better nature.

Not even the gentle counsels of her friend, Rosrdo, could make her swerve from the idea that her grand aunt was unjust, as truth she was, but Valiska had been sorry and disobedient at times, and when her anger was raging, did not stop to think that she was partly in fault, even though her conscience told her so. Her proud nature would not let her acknowledge it.

Thus things went on until the girl was in her seventeenth year, nearly a woman in years, but a child in knowledge of the world and its ways. Her aunt died and she was left alone, sole mistress of the cottage, with no one but herself and her old grand uncle to care for.

Valiska wept bitterly when her poor old relative was laid away, and tried to forget her unhappy past and remember all the kindness her aunt had done her in her childhood.

She thought her old uncle comfortable as she could, for he could not work steadily and was at home most of the time, and kept the house in order. She began to realize that she was no longer a child; that she had to face the world and earn a living for both, as her uncle would soon be unable to do anything. But how was she to do it? She was not strong enough to do hard work, and, she, she had not been very studious during her aunt's life time, and she knew the little income left them would not last forever. She must do something, it was plain, and she was handy with her needle, and the neighbors, glad to help her, gave her some sewing which was the means of helping her to keep out of debt and earn a frugal living. Then when night came she folded away her work and took out her books to study. A desire to make up for the time she had lost in the past had taken possession of her, and study she did, long and diligently, and during the long summer nights she pored over her books anxious to improve herself.

So for things had gone call with Valiska alone her aunt's death, but she was soon to have another chance to gain a victory over herself, for there had moved to V——, a family in which were several grown daughters, who seemed to be very nice girls, but upon close acquaintance, proved themselves to be rude and unladylike, and it was not long before they and Valiska were on friendly terms, much to the disgust of Sorrida Matthews, who loved Valiska, and was pained to think she would be seen in such constant companionship with them, particularly the oldest girl, Hetalie, who was not well thought of, and of whom Valiska knew nothing, else she would have dropped her company, and she knows the truth. Hetalie Valiska was beautiful and showed her best side to Valiska, who was a passionate worshipper of loveliness. Sorrida came and tried to draw her away from one whom she feared would cause her to be wrongly judged.

Very timidly she broached the subject to Valiska, who was talking excitedly about the beauty and sweetness of her friend.

"Valiska, darling, do not be angry when I tell you that you should be more careful. You know this girl and her family are perfect strangers here. No one knows who they are, or where they came from, and Hetalie does not conduct herself in a becoming manner."

"It is prejudice," broke in Valiska. "Because I am the same as you are, I ought to believe false reports about her. Hetalie is my friend, I do not think it of you."

"I have not heard anything but what I know to be so," was the answer. "Hetalie is not fit company for any girl, and then she does not give good example. She is very unkind to her poor old grandmother, and runs out long after sunset to laugh and gossip with her friends, leaving the poor old soul alone. I will not say more, Valiska, but if you value your good name, if you do not wish to lose all the friends you expect you—do not be seen with her again."

At this Valiska rose defiantly, tossing her head, and said: "If you rashly judge her because she is my friend, because you do not like her, you may do so; but it is my affair if I do not choose to be handled by any one, or care if I lose their friendship. You may tell who ever sent you, that I shall choose my company, regardless of what they say. I shall go with her when and where I like."

Sorrida left her with the sad conviction that she had chosen the wrong road and would not see the right.

Thus things went on from day to day, and in the flat opposite Valiska became careless of her duties and was fast losing her old friends.

"It is a beautiful world," she thought, "full of sights and pleasures I would not have tasted, but for this new friend of mine."

Ah, poor, misguided child, she did not, would not, see how fast a downward into ruin she was hurrying, and how fast Hetalie was leading her into the whirlpool of sin.

Valiska thought of her when she thanked God for the gift of her friend. The good father of her mother, who had been a kind, indulgent father to her, and who had given her every, every thing she asked for, and lavished on her every, every thing, but the one thing needed, the knowledge of her duty to God, and the knowledge of the Saviour, who died for her, and who, in return, asks only for her love, and her service, in return for His sufferings, and agonies, and death, and the Father, who had given

THE UNIVERSAL REQUIEM.

Pastoral Letter from [illegible] Reverend Francis Mora, D. D.

To the Very Rev. and Rev. Clergy of the Diocese of Monterey and San Jose.

REV. AND DEAR SIRS:—You are aware, no doubt, that the Holy Father, on the occasion of his Golden Jubilee, celebrated in the City of Rome, a solemn Canonization of Saints and several Beatifications.

By Letters of Easter Sunday last, his Holiness invited the spectacle of the souls suffering in Purgatory, and wishes them to partake of the benefits of his Jubilee. To this effect he has ordained that a special Mass of Requiem for the dead (the first of the Missal) be celebrated by all the Bishops and Priests of the Catholic world, with as much solemnity as possible, granting to the Priests the favor of the privileged altar, and to all the faithful a Plenary Indulgence for the souls in Purgatory, provided they comply with the usual conditions, viz: they approach the Holy Sacraments of Confession and Communion.

In obedience to this order of the Holy See, we command all the Priests of our Diocese to celebrate the Requiem Mass on the last Sunday of September, of the present year, with as much solemnity as circumstances will permit. Moreover, we direct them to read this Circular to their flocks, on Sunday or two before the date above appointed for the celebration of the Requiem Mass, and to exhort them to approach the Holy Sacraments of Confession and Communion necessary for the gaining of the Indulgence, reminding them, in forcible terms, of the obligations of charity, under which they lie to do all in their power to alleviate the sufferings of the souls in Purgatory.

Given from Our Residence, Los Angeles, September 8, 1888.

Bishop of Monterey and Los Angeles.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

—Miss Rachel Sherman, daughter of General Sherman, in conversation with a friend announced that her mother and her sister overjoyed at the near approach of her brother's ordination as a priest of the Society of Jesus, which event will take place next year.

—Speaking of the status of the new order of deaconesses, the London (Ont.) Catholic Record observes pitifully that "the world does not make the monk." So it is easier to imitate the dress of the Catholic Sisterhoods than to practice the purity, piety, zeal, and charity of the self-sacrificed religious orders of the Catholic Church.

—St. Brendan, whose discovery of America prior to that of Columbus is now an established fact, would seem to have been honored by the erection of a memorial cross upon the mountain in Kerry that overlooks the bay from which he sailed. There is enough material in the life of this great Saint for some literateur to make a name for himself by collecting and putting it in shape for the reading public.

—A Pontifical Decree, bearing the signature of his Eminence Cardinal Ledochowski, institutes a new decoration in commemoration of the Holy Father's Jubilee, the insignia to consist of a cross bearing upon it the words, "Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice," in one part, and "Pyid. Kal. Jan. MDCCCLXXIX," in another; these to be invested with this decoration who may be found to have served of the Holy See.

—Once more a distinguished German officer has changed the epaulet for the cassock, and retired from the barracks to the convent. This is Major Ernst von Oss, formerly tutor to the son of Prince George, the heir presumptive to the throne of Saxony. The German Protestant papers express their astonishment at this, one of them declaring that the man must be a maniac to throw away a promising military career for seclusion in a cell.

—On the 6th of Juna last, the Holy Father ordered that a Solemn Requiem Mass should take place all over the world on the last Sunday in this month. It is to be hoped that this universal commemoration for the departed souls will be attended by copious rain showers and that millions of holy Communions, prayers, alms and pious works on that day will more the mercy of God to release souls innumerable in number from the pains of Purgatory and admit them into the everlasting joys of heaven.

—Each one can judge of the incident as he will, but to the Christian there will be a note of God's rule in this recent death of "Citizen Cosse, a lieutenant of the Commune." On a recent Sunday, as unbelievers inform us, Cosse was "making oven-mouth speeches to a Socialist crowd at No. 19 Cite Lachaterre, Paris, when he suddenly turned pale, and the great consternation of the audience, and just as he uttered the words, Il n'y a pas de Dieu (There is no God), down he fell dead as a hammer." Yes, there is a God!

—We are pleased to know that Mr. Jas. J. Tracey's latest work, "Conquests of our Holy Faith," has met with a most flattering reception in Rome. The author, it seems, Pope Leo XIII., who some time ago honored Mr. Tracey with the present of a splendid chasse, in recognition of his eminent literary services to the Church, has been graciously pleased to send Mr. Tracey his Apostolic Benediction. The Catholic Standard says the book is calculated to do the great cause of the Church at this particular time. His Eminence sends Mr. Tracey his grateful acknowledgments. Cardinal Newman, Cardinal Moran, Archbishop of Sydney, Cardinal Manning, Archbishop Kirby, Father General Anderledy, S. J., and Father Jackman, Provincial of the Irish Franciscans, have also sent their compliments and congratulations.

A Protestant Preacher's Falsehoods.

When men who pretend to be called to preach God's truth from sectarian pulpits, produce unblushed falsehoods therefrom, it is not to be wondered at if non-Catholics become disgusted thereat and turn their backs upon all forms of Protestant services. The pulpits of Protestant meeting-houses are very often prostituted by Protestant preachers to the worst purposes of arousing anti-Catholic passions among the ignorant people. Preachers seem to glory in heaping upon a place supposed to be "holy," the most abominable libels against Catholics, the Church of God and historical truth. Falsehoods are sometimes designedly fabricated for the purpose of arousing the worst passions of fanaticism, and when no slander vile enough can be formulated, then recourse is had to some long-covered malicious inventions of past generations, which have been enabled to obtain a thousand times by irritated Catholic critiques.

A city paper states that Rev. Dr. Harcourt of the Methodist Episcopal Church, delivered a lecture on last Sunday evening in the course of which he uttered some falsehoods so foul and so malicly with age as to be calculated to disgust even the Father of Lies himself.

This bigoted firebrand, among other diabolical calumnies, is reported to have said, when alluding to the Priesthood of the Catholic Church in America:

"The Priesthood numbers also in the world are more of a jolly character than those. They are as hostile to our institutions as they profitably can be, and only wait a better opportunity to be more so. They are shrewd enough to know that the power is in the hierarchy. It is based on some material foundation stone of our social structure, and they will use the shillelagh of the law for the present to our common damage. Some people will know what these secret societies are very near over an affected people. They would throw the Constitution of the Republic, and by Popery make it despotic if it be legitimate strength and power."

In reply to this villainous and ridiculous tirade from the Priesthood, we tell this turbulent and untruthful calumniator that he was guilty before God of bearing "false witness against his neighbor," if he ever uttered the above atrocious falsehood. There are no truer or better citizens in this country than the Priests of the Catholic Church. They have never, by word or deed, been guilty of a single act that could merit the uncharitable calumny of this cast-iron fanatical falsifier. On the contrary, if their unobtrusive Methodist malignerd could allow half as good a record as conservative citizens, the country's future would present a more pleasing aspect, but we are not alone in the opinion that the worst and most dangerous element in this Republic is the rank and rotting political parson—half preacher and half politician—who desecrates the Sunday by circulating slanders, and who defiles his quasi-religion by anti-Catholic rant.

The next piece of villainous slander which Dr. Harcourt heralded forth from his strychnine of bilingsgate, was that risk ist of past generations:

"It was Lafayette, himself a Catholic, who said: 'If the liberties of the American people are ever destroyed, they will fall by the hands of the Roman Church.'"

This lie of the last century has been continued a dozen times in the Mormon assembly, and now, we publicly challenge Dr. Harcourt to prove its truth or be soundly convicted of stating a malicious falsehood. Lafayette never uttered such language, and it is only born of the lowest intellect who dig this repulsive falsehood out of the tomb of untruth, in order to gratify their grovelling passions against Catholics and their ghoulish hatred against the Church of God.

—Dr. Harcourt, perhaps not the attempt that is now being made to resurrect some of the old lies and slanders against the Popes, Cardinals, Bishops and Priests of the Catholic Church, in such measure as to make the anathemas which they utter against all who, in any way, oppose the Church.

Another falsehood. No Pope, Bishop or Priest ever tried to "overthrow" the Public School System. The Catholic Church has maintained that that system is not good enough for those who like it, but as it is not Christian, of course it does not suit the Church, hence Catholic Parochial Schools were inaugurated for the education of Catholic children. These schools are built and supported by Catholics who also pay their proportion of public taxation towards supporting schools they do not patronize. And for doing this Catholics are assailed by every fanatical firebrand that desires to fling calumny at them! If Dr. Harcourt cited any words of Popes, Bishops, or Priests encouraging the "overthrow" of Public Schools, he must have borrowed them from some other manufacturer of malicious calumnies, or else fabricated them himself for the occasion.

—"He contributed the sociology of our Godless Public Schools, and thought there was no cause for Protestants to complain of the Parochial Schools, and showed how the teaching of the superior Schools emasculate the morals of the Parochial Schools, and how the teaching of the sanctified legends, that make the Saints of Christ, superstition and plunderers." The people shrieked approbation and plaudered."

This is regular Methodistical malignity of the most diabolical description. Children educated in parochial schools are Christians, and as to their mental acquirements they are far superior to those half-educated people who emanate from Public Schools. In the Parochial Schools the religious education part is thoroughly solid, useful and, above all, Christian; in the Public Schools it is superficial. Pupils are taught a multitude of subjects but they receive only a superficial smattering of each. Hence, when they go through the form of graduating, they go without the knowledge of God and are but little knowledge of any other kind worth having.

We presume Dr. Harcourt passed through the Public School curriculum, and if so he is a fair specimen of how ignorant and vicious a person may be and yet undertake to preach the gospel of peace and goodwill. If Dr. Harcourt would confine himself to telling the truth about the Catholic Church, he would find far more time for Methodist sermons, but while he has the foul scent of falsehood to furnish his fanatics, there is little hope that he will be an ornament either to mankind in general or to Methodism in particular.

THE ADRIAN BILL.

Continuation of the Evidence of Historical Writers in Proof of its False Character. Absurd Statements of English and Irish Historians—How "Iniquity Hath Lied to Itself."

In addition to the testimony which we presented last week, in order to show the spurious character of the Adrian Bull, we now desire to introduce the evidence of other writers regarding that dubious document.

ANNE MACGLOTHLIN'S TESTIMONY.

In the first article of the present series, we have given a portion of the strong evidence which Anne MacGlothlin gives in her History of Ireland furnishes, in order to prove the spurious nature of both the Adrian and Alexander Bulls. The annexed paragraphs from the same work, are, therefore, only matter of what has already been said by that distinguished Irish historian. Commenting on the text of the Adrian Bull Anne MacGlothlin says:

The above was an effect pronounced against Ireland, by which the rights of man, and the most sacred laws are violated, under the specious pretext of religion and the reformation of morals. The Irish were no longer a power to contend against. The people, who had never bent under a foreign yoke, assumed—or rather subject Ireland, were condemned to lose their liberty, without being heard, based. But can the Vicar of Jesus Christ be accused of so glaring an act of injustice? Can he be thought capable of having dictated a Bull which contains an entire calumny, which dispossesses so many ancient proprietors of their possessions, and so much blood to be shed, and a length tended to the destruction of religion in the island? It is a thing not to be credited.

In truth were we to consider the circumstances of the time of the Bull, it has all the appearance of a forgery. Adrian was a native of Adrian IV. Baronius quotes it, without giving any reason, as a thing well known, and makes it responsible. It remained unpublished for twenty years; it is said that it was published in 1155, and not made public till 1172 * * *

The Bull gains but little authentication from the authority of John of Salisbury, afterwards Bishop of Chartres, in his treatise "De nugis curialium." The writer is made to say, at the end of the last chapter of his book, that "Pope Adrian had granted Ireland to King Henry, at his request, in lieu of the patrimony of his Holiness by hereditary right, inasmuch as all the islands believed to be Roman Church, by the concession of the Emperor Constantine the Great. But this donation is considered by the learned as having been added to the chapter by a strange hand. Some the author, in speaking particularly in the sixth and eighth books of his visit to the Holy Father at Benevento, where he remained with him for three months, states most minutely his various conversations he had with his Holiness, yet not a word of any such grant of the Bull is spoken, though it was a matter of particular importance, and that was naturally the fit time to have mentioned it. There do Bills, a contemporary of this Prelate, who publishes his opinion in various epistles, entire opinion of the other.

It is well known that King Henry, who found creatures sufficiently devoted to him to revenge his quarrel with the holy Prelate of Canterbury, and that want for royal revenue to satisfy, and to reach from, the wrings of the times, in order to have an appearance of authenticity to a document so necessary for the confirmation of his cupidity.

Henry, in the year 1171, had obtained from Pope Alexander III., as Pope Adrian was dead, a grant of Ireland, on the ground that it belonged to the Roman Church, by the concession of the Emperor Constantine the Great. But this was some in consideration by the learned as having been added to the chapter by a strange hand. Some the author, in speaking particularly in the sixth and eighth books of his visit to the Holy Father at Benevento, where he remained with him for three months, states most minutely his various conversations he had with his Holiness, yet not a word of any such grant of the Bull is spoken, though it was a matter of particular importance, and that was naturally the fit time to have mentioned it. There do Bills, a contemporary of this Prelate, who publishes his opinion in various epistles, entire opinion of the other.

It is well known that King Henry, who found creatures sufficiently devoted to him to revenge his quarrel with the holy Prelate of Canterbury, and that want for royal revenue to satisfy, and to reach from, the wrings of the times, in order to have an appearance of authenticity to a document so necessary for the confirmation of his cupidity. Besides, it appears that Salisbury had considerable influence with Henry, and strongly urged to visit his countrymen Adrian, and not with any commission from the King of England; while the Bull, according to Mather of Westminster, was obtained by a solemn embassy, which Henry sent to the Pope. In my opinion, however, this circumstance appears to be another little forgery, and that Adrian is in the first who mentions this embassy, and that two centuries after the Bull. Hoveden, a contemporary, and English contemporary rather, respecting this embassy and the Bull which it is affirmed was created, is not mentioned, which, though negative, deserve some attention. This author, who was a friend of the glory of Henry II., and his nation, commences his annals by arguing that the English had entered Ireland in a warlike manner, and, with their forces increasing every day, they subjugated a considerable part of it." Anne MacGlothlin's Ireland by any Pope; and I consider it highly improbable that he would have forgotten to speak of a circumstance so necessary to give an appearance of justice to the unprecedented conduct of his nation. Moreover this he, it may be affirmed that no Pope, either before or after Adrian IV., ever published a notice so severely without cause. We have some instances of Popes making use of their spiritual authority in opposition to temporal rulers; we have known them to excommunicate emperors and kings, and place their states under an interdict, for crimes of heresy, or other crimes; but we have heard no instance of Pope even up to tyrants, without having been provoked before any tribunal, or convicted of any crime.

It would be entirely a work of supererogation on our part to add a single word of comment to the clear, concise and convincing testimony which the learned Abbe MacGeoghegan offers in order to show that he has no doubts whatever upon his mind in regard to the spurious character of the bogus Adrian Bull. Hence we will leave our readers to draw their own conclusions from the foregoing extracts, and proceed to produce other witnesses in support of the Catholic side of this question.

FATHER THOMAS N. BURKE'S EVIDENCE.

The next witness whose evidence we introduce in order to show the fallacy and the fraudulent character of the Adrian and Alexander Bulls, is the celebrated Dominican, Father Thomas N. Burke, of cherished memory, who was both a great Catholic Priest and a distinguished Irish Patriot.

In his first Lecture in answer to Froude, which was delivered in the Academy of Music, New York, on the evening of November 12th, 1872, Father Burke alluded to the Papal Bulls of Adrian and Alexander, in the following terms of unqualified condemnation:

Henry landed in Ireland in 1171. He was after mediating the Holy Archbishop of Canterbury, St. Thomas a Becket. They sentenced the Irishe before the foot of the altar, before the Blessed Sacrament at the Vesper hour. The blood of the saint and martyr was upon his hands when he came to Ireland to teach the Irish. "Do unto others as you would have the occasion of their conduct! Were the sufferers was 400 years from the sacred soil of Erin as one unworthy to profane it by his fresh, he wept over to Henry and procured from him a letter permitting any of his subjects that chose to go back for Ireland to do so, and there to relate the atrocious tyrant King Dermot in his kingdom. They came there as protectors and help

Farm and Home.

THE SERENE MESSAGE.

So thou hast lived with a sublime intent
Must walked the world, with heaven linked upon,
And done no wrong, thy guardians well may be
The men, the comrades thou so much prefer
And the calm peaks that tower along the skies.

If to thine ear the parlor of young fools
Has been like music, and thy heart is fain
To spare the reason and such living thing,
Then surely some time shall a sweet bird sing
Into thy grave, that has not fired in vain.

If thou hast met one only word to cheer
The spirits of thy fellows on the earth,
And done no wrong, then magnet then find thy home
Content beneath the unfathomable dome,
And think the stars for thy and hold birth.

So runs the message that I offered hear
In this dear spot, where I could wish to lie
If I were dead, still listening to the breeze
Under the pines, the sentenceless trees
That softly whisper of the days gone by.

E. A. BROWN.

Fashion's Latest Fancies.

[WRITTEN FOR THIS DEPARTMENT BY "STYLES."]

—Flame and flesh color are beautifully blended in new silks for evening wear.

—Low-throated dresses are now very much in vogue at all the fashionable watering places.

—Great simplicity prevails in the decoration of dress skirts, both in the flounce and the promenade.

—Dark lace over white lace is very beautiful in effect, especially in the evening with diamond ornaments.

—The fashionable colors for the early fall are pearl gray, olive, and absinthe green, roseda and heifer red.

—The prettiest of all hats for a little girl is a wide-brimmed Leghorn, trimmed with one long, curling, full ostrich plume.

—Steels are beginning to disappear from skirts, and in place of bustles and steels a lower bouchette plaiting is worn in the back attached to the waist band under the skirt.

—There is no decided change in hair-dressing, although there is a standing promise that this will occur in the near future, when the back hair will deer nd to the nape of the neck.

—Black watered silk skirts, draped with broaded gauze, edged with Chantilly lace, and worn with bodices of Chantilly net, make thoroughly elegant toilets for dress occasions this season.

—English house jackets, to be worn over skirts of various kinds, are made of India cashmere of softest texture, and in beautiful dye of olive, moss green, almond Russian blue, Roman and red and cream white.

—One very good black silk, made in crystal but unremarkable style, can be made by adding different vests, collars, cuffs, and so on, to appear in at least half a dozen gowns, so successfully, too, as to deceive the wisest.

Facts for Farmers.

—Once a week the stable should be sprinkled with a solution made of one pound of copperas in two gallons of soft water.

—A sharp shovel be smitted with boiling water, made alkaline with washing soda. Every particle of salt and cream should be removed. After being well washed the churn should be rinsed again by using boiling water.

—If the fruit is likely to be all ground, the removal of a third or even of a half of it will often result in a much larger and finer crop than if all had been allowed to remain, and the pecuniary returns will be correspondingly greater.

—It is generally acknowledged that winter dairying pays best, and for this reason farmers should give more attention to this part of the business. To attempt this next winter suitable feed must be raised the summer, and good warm stabling provided.

—Corn and potatoes may often be profitably grown in the same field, and the cultivation of these crops during the season will mix the manure in the soil much more perfectly than it could be if plowed under.

Industrial Statistics.

—Five hundred thousand orange trees have been set out in California and their cultivation is extending.

—The whole value of fences in the United States may be set down at $2,000,000,000, and it costs $100,000,000 annual y to keep them in repair.

—By far the best potato for late spring use is the Rose Imperial. It does not sprout early, but remains comparatively solid until they planted new potatoes are ready for use.

—The wool product of California has averaged nearly 40,000,000 pounds per year since 1880, bringing to the State $6,000,000 a year. This is about one-seventh of the entire wool product of the country.

—Peanuts are becoming a popular and profitable crop in Georgia. Ten peanut plant makes forage and fruit and nutritious hay, and 125 bushels to a single acre will raise and fatten many pounds of bacon.

Useful and Unusual.

—By a system of dry cold-storage strawberries can be kept for several months with unimpaired freshness and solidity.

—It has been figured up that it would take from seven to thirty five ordinary lightning flashes to keep one incandescent lamp alight for an hour.

—A microbe for laying bees is a remarkable acquisition to be exhibited at the Buffalo Fair. A machine for blacking boots will be the next invention, probably.

—A citizen of Wanamaker, Wis., has succeeded in tempering brass, and has exhibited brass hatchet and axe that will cut around hemlock log without turning the edge.

—A chimney that will not fill up with soot may be made by plastering it inside with clay mixed with salt. Chimneys should be built from the cellar up instead of hung to the wall. The stovepipe hole should be at least eighteen inches from the ceiling.

—A keen observer of railroad matters predicts that in ten years there will not be a railroad in the United States which will be operated with steam locomotives. Electricity, he says, will do the business by that time.

—A method of heating cars with heated air from the locomotive has been invented by M. ers. Lyon and Moore, engineers living at Duxbury. A company of business men and railroad men has been formed with a capital of $100,000.

—By a canal lift recently finished at Arques, France, by Edwin Clarke, the English engineer, five or six locks are done away with, and the boat, often with loads of as much as 220 tons, are lifted fifty feet at a single operation in a few minutes and with no loss of water.

HER BROTHER'S CIGARETTE.

Like raven's wing her locks so jet,
Her soft eyes beneath which lend regret,
Dimple and cheeks her ideal boast,
Pauline had brother's cigarette.

Roses, with dewy diamonds set,
Decorated her window's parapet;
With cross she turned a match to get,
And lit her brother's cigarette.

Her puffs of smoky violet
Formed in fantastic silk-nettes;
She blushed, laughed, coughed a little, yet,
She smoked her brother's cigarette.

II.

Her eyes with betray tears were wet,
Her hang raw limp beneath its set,
Her brow was pressed with beaded sweat,
She smoked her brother's cigarette.

NOTES FROM ROME.

Incidents in Many Other Lands.

The Pope's Munificence.

On the Feast of the Holy Archdeacon St. Lawrence, titular of the Diocese of Perugia, his Holiness presented to that Cathedral, over which he ruled for 32 years as Bishop, the magnificent reliquary, that is the chasuble, dalmatics, and humeral veil, the Jubilee gifts of the princely families Sciphoes, Aldobrandini and Salviati, which constituted one of the glories of the Vatican Exhibition. Some wonder these vestments to have been the personal property of Pope Paul V., of the family Borghese, but most probably they are copied after the pattern of those made use of by that Pontiff; in fact, the style of both form and embroidery is really that of the beginning of the 17th century, the epoch of the Pontificate of Paul V., 1605-1621. The rich material, cloth of gold, is heavy with gold embroidery, somewhat oriental in character, though the shape of both chasuble and dalmatic variance rather of the style of the 15th century; the three vestments bear the collective escutcheon of the three princely families, drawn wrought in silk and gold, the escutcheons surmounted by the gonfalon of the Holy Church, with the keys of Peter, the symbol of the temporal; the humeral veil is bordered with more simple arabesques, the centre piece being an immense star of two hundred in gold, encircling the monogram of Christ. The splendid gift was over for the first time by Archbishop Pecchi on the Feast of St. Lorenzo, August 10th, 1888. His Holiness further ordained that this year, at the opening of the scholastic term, seven alumni be received in the Diocese Seminary at Perugia, and three in the College Urbanelli, at the expense of their education and maintenance is to be defrayed from his privy purse as long as they remain in the institutions. These alumni may be chosen either from city or country, provided they be poor and possess aptitude for the Priesthood. These last candidates are to be tried after the examination to be held on this 18th inst., in the presence of the Archbishop of Perugia and two Canons of that Metropolitan Chapter.

Parnell Defense Fund.

When the Times assailed Mr. Parnell's character it was playing a safe game. From the pecuniary point of view it could suffer little or no loss, and on the score of morality it had nothing to lose. It is certainly true to say that the Times is not read for the morality it inculcates, but for its Parliamentary reports, for the letters of eminent persons that are sent to it, and for the excellence of its correspondence from abroad. And it will continue to be read by the same persons even if it is found guilty of fraud. The Times, then, incurred no risk whilst it assailed upon making a bankrupt of Mr. Parnell financially as well as morally. But the actions are falling miserably. Sir Hopkins and Johnson, Scotchmen and Wishmen are rallying around Mr. Parnell, and the Defense Fund promises to be taken up with genuine enthusiasm. Archbishop Walsh and Archbishop Croke have already shown their interest in it with characteristic generosity and patriotism. Each has contributed the princely sum of £50 and in doing so have given an emphasis to the feeling of the Irish people for Mr. Parnell—a confidence which is unshaken by abuse or calumny.

Father Secchi's Memorial.

The Italian press, Liberal as well as Catholic, unite in praising the newly-erected statuary in the Lateran Cathedral, raised to the memory of the celebrated Jesuit astronomer Father Angelo Secchi, by the munificence and perseverance of his friend and disciple, Father Stanislaus Fumiani, S. J., who built inexpensive companion from 1864 to 1873, and almost his equal in astronomical science. This observatory, wholly due to the industrious and private means of Father Fumiani, is, taking it all in all, considered to be second in Italy after that of Rome, which represents it in the small degree it is in size of the Equatorial. The magnificent telescope of Father Fumiani is four metres in length, weighs 1,900 kilograms, which, including the mounting, make about 2,500.

Closing Jubilee Pilgrimages.

The closing period of the Pope's Jubilee falls begun last week with a series of pilgrimages which will continue to the end of the year, when the Holy Father will crown those demonstrations of faith and piety by the solemn Beatification of the two martyrs, Fenbeyre and Chanel, and of the Venerable Angeline, one of the first disciples and most faithful imitators of St. Philip Neri. The Church Triumphant will that be particularly associated, as it has been for the beginning of the Jubilee Year, with the Church militant, the saints of the Church Militant. And it is for the purpose of associating the Church Suffering with the benefit of these prayers, in virtue of the Communion of Saints, that the Sovereign Pontiff has fixed the last Sunday in September for a solemn Mass for the dead.

More Irish Missionaries.

Right Rev. Dr. Moore, Bishop of Ballarat, who has been looking in Ireland for assistance in his spiritual labors in his Australian diocese, has been as successful as he could fairly wish. He will probably leave Ireland for home about the 20th of next month, when he will take with him no fewer than 36 persons, counting nuns as well as Priests, to devote themselves to the advancement of religion in that part of Australia under his episcopal jurisdiction.

Sheridan's Successor.

General Schofield, who succeeds to the command of the army in a most estimable gentleman. He gave Archbishop Ryan a good reception at West Point some time ago, and his wife is a convert, who in a few years seems to have acquired all the simple instincts of Catholic faith. While her husband was in command at Chicago, Mrs. Schofield was noted among the Catholic ladies of the city for her great charity and unobtrusive piety. There is little doubt that the grade of Lieutenant-General will be revived, and General Schofield named for the rank.

The Next Consistory.

Two Consistories, one for the Preconization of Bishops for vacant Sees, and the other for the creation of new Cardinals, will take place during the final period of the Jubilee festivals. It has not been yet decided whether the two Consistories will be held about Christmas, with an interval of some days between them, or if his Holiness will hold in September the Consistory for the Preconization of Bishops, reserving for Christmas that for the creation of new Cardinals.

Italian Catholic Items.

Amongst the pilgrimages that will reach Rome in September, special interest will attach to one representing the Italian clergy. Whilst making this manifestation of faith and devotion to the Holy See, the Priests of Italy will, by their united action, offer an eloquent protest against the calumnies shown by those who use Papal Cloke therefrom to foster the freedom of the Sacred Ministry. The pilgrimage, which promises to be numerically the most imposing of the year, will arrive in Rome on the 24th of September, and will be received in audience by the Holy Father on the 26th. It is also announced that a fresh pilgrimage is being organized at Milan and will arrive in the Eternal City about the middle of September. Among the latest acts of Italian Government tyranny are the destruction of the monastery and church of St. Chiara in Rome, built in 1661, and the imprisonment for three months of a Mother Abbess in Perugia accused of vexating Government property, when forced to dialodge from the convent by order of the "paternal" Italian Ministry.

Irish Missionaries for Australia.

The missionary spirit is still alive and vigorous in Ireland. Several members of the Society of Jesus have just left for the diocese of Melbourne. They go out in charge of Father Duffy, who was so long connected with the Church of St. Francis Xavier in Gardiner street, Dublin. This venerable saint of St. Ignatius would be in his seventy-sixth year; yet so eager was he to do all he could for Heaven before the coming of the night when no man can work, that he begged permission to accompany the other voluntary exiles to the Antipodes. With him go Father Isaac Moore, who had a long and eminent career in the Southern Continent. Father Manning, who was till lately a professor in Belvidere College, and Father Hubert, Three scholastics in the persons of Messrs. Murphy, M'Curtin and Pigott, complete the party. The last-mentioned was originally a Dominican and was best known as Mr. Pigott, but the Master's call having come to him, he gave up the care of India to undertake the care of souls, relating under the banner of St. Ignatius. The vacation commencement, by, but temporarily, to some people.

Success of Cardinal Lavigerie.

His Eminence Cardinal Lavigerie has started the European capitals by his recitals of the horrors of slavery in Africa. In London he seems to have borne good fruit and stimulated the sympathy of all in his work. In Belgium, the noble ex-prelate has been received the aid of the King in stopping the traffic in human flesh. In Maastricht, Holland, where we last hear of him making known the terrible condition of those held in bondage, he moved his audience to tears by the recital of the inhuman treatment of the African women. While at Maestricht he gave the ballot to seven Sisters, who have consecrated their lives to the amelioration of equatorial Africa. The mission of Cardinal Lavigerie, undertaken at the command of the Holy Father, is destined to accomplish much good for the slaves, who have, in the Cardinal's opinion, found their chief protector in the Church.

Cardinal Newman.

The Star writes as follows regarding His Eminence Cardinal Newman, who a short time ago completed his 87th birthday: "Our people are aware that Cardinal Newman, who is now almost the last of the great Oxford straightforward circumstance, had some thoughts of devoting himself to journalism as a career. An excellent opportunity offered itself, for he made such an impression on the Irish directors of the Times by his letters that he had contributed to that journal on the Education Question, and the new editor of "Catholicus" that he was to succeed Mr. McNeiley as editor of the very hardcome salary—£1,800 a year is the figure at which report puts it. "Shall I be free," was his response to the tempting offer. "Are we what I think?" The need of good the reply nor add that Newman preferred to retain his liberty of conscience, and to write as a priest. One cannot help thinking that full of possibilities was that auspicious choice.

French Catholic News.

The Catholic laymen of France are organizing a pilgrimage to Rome for the month of October next. Next month has been a great pilgrimage to Lourdes. The Tribune states that over 900 invalids are to take part in the pilgrimage. The son of M. Jules Harmel, the Catholic employer par excellence, has been nominated by his Holiness, Pope of the Order of St. Gregory the Great. Mr. Harmel has succeeded his father in the management of the factory at Val-des-Bois. The new chapelle of M. Leo Taxil was inaugurated recently in M. Edward Joubert, the son of M. Joubert, who so distinguished himself by his administration of Maisons Lafitte in 1870-71. Mgr. Fava, Bishop of Grenoble, has just publicly encouraged the Free Grand Freemasonry, sent his apostolic benediction.

Stranger than Fiction.

OTTAWA, ONT., August 21.—On a recent Thursday evening, Miss McNeeley, residing at Carleton Place, found an old man sitting in the house in a paralytic condition. After seeing that [illegible] further McNeeley took him in for the night. The stranger could give no account of himself. He remained in bed and gradually became worse, and a physician pronounced his case hopeless. In handling his clothes several letters fell out, one of which was addressed to James McDowell, Belfast, Ire., while another bore the address of McNeeley himself as James McDowell was the name of her father in Ireland, whom she had not seen for thirty years. Mrs. McNeeley read the letter to find that the one in whose possession it had been found was none other than her parent. The one addressed to McNeeley was from brother to his father, in which he informed him that the old gentleman was in Canada, and was living at Ottawa, which he left Bros. $12,0-6. Yesterday the old gentleman died, never having regained consciousness.

A Request to the Devil.

A correspondent at Helmsgiven writes to a contemporary: The following gentlemen comprise the committee of the Fenian Brotherhood at present. A man dwelt a week or two ago in Pallapare, in the interior of the country, who was said to have had a bad and bloody life. He had always been known to be well off, but nobody knew how he had gained his possessions. There were many strange stories afloat, but one which was more credited than all the rest was to the effect that Hardgarten, as was his name, had, in his early days, been an intimate friend of "Whatabuse" (the arid one), with whom he had several transactions of a commercial character. When Hardgarten's will was opened it was found that he had bequeathed all his landed property to the devil. The family naturally protested against the will, and the question was taken to the Courts to be settled. Everybody seems anxious not to offend any of the parties concerned. There can be no doubt that the devil is thus a landowner, by legal right, in Finland.

—Rev. Stephen Lynch returned to Manhattan College this week from a trip to Cuba, where the Cuba archbishop sent something for the purchase of another an altar property.

YOUNG MEN'S INSTITUTE.

Closing Week of the Fourth Grand Council Nationalization of the Order—New Grand Officers—The Supreme Grand Council Contractual Rates—Etc., Etc.

—The Fourth Grand Council.

—Was truly a brilliant success.

—The 200 delegates were delightful—but tired.

—The work accomplished was very satisfactory.

—Everybody seemed to have everything in its sure their guests a pleasant time.

—A number of useful amendments to the Constitution were made.

—The Salary of Grand Secretary Tuohy was increased to $1200, and that popular official deserves this recognition.

—Thos. J. Boland was unanimously re-elected Grand Trustee, and Dr. Lewis Ayres, of the St. Vincent's Hospital, Portland, Or.

—Henry B. Gilbride, the old and organ tion of Institutions in Oregon, Seattle, Victoria, and other parts of the North-west, has returned to this city.

—The correspondence views exhibited by Frank M King in the Convention on Tuesday evening were certainly creditable to the gentlemen they clearly depicted.

—Hon. M. Magee, the New York delegate, was the recipient of marked attention from the various delegates and from the people of Rockton. He was accorded the seat of honor next to the President of the Council and took an active part in the constitutional debates.

—The promenade concert and ball given by C.M.I. No. 3 of Stockton, was a complete social success. The attendance of the large parlors were crowded with spectators, and many delegates of the Council were in the enjoyment of the hours in the lively mazes of the dance.

—Immediately on the opening of the Council a grand march took place. The visiting delegates were marshaled by Mr. Tuohy, and preceded by the second Artillery Band marched to the depot to meet the President of the Supreme Council and other prominent officers from the Capital City, and the Grand Officers of the Council, numbering about 1,000 members. The schoolgirls were lined with people, and the parade was greeted with frequent cheers. The members of the Supreme Council

—The Ladies of the Rockton Convention.

The Fourth Grand Council concluded its session with a delightful evening with a grand banquet hall in Weber Hall. The hall was appropriately decorated, and the tables groaned under the weight of the good things. The ladies were laid for five hundred persons. John T. Kyne presided as toastmaster, and the following gentlemen responded to toasts: "Our Guests Were Welcome," Grand President McGloin; "The New York Institute," George W. Mayer; "The Chief Executive of the Country," J. J. Gallagher; "Washington Territory and the Y. M. I.," Thos. J. Boland; "Our Institutions," Hon. C. C. Conwell; "British Columbia," Rev. W. THAT BEAUTIFUL HOME BEYOND.

Oh, why do we willingly suffer the ills,
The bitterest sorrow and strife,
Nor murmur at all at reverses and sky—
How dokey the burden of life.
Oh, why feel it pleasure to suffer for Him,
Whom love's most enchanting and fondest
The more through the night of sorrow
bliss
In that home of the Saviour beyond.

Behold in the cloister the servants of God,
Deprived of the comforts of earth,
Walking the road that the Saviour once trod,
Ever strangers to pleasure and mirth.
Oh, why do these ladies of heavenly mien
Give up all life's pleasures so fond?
The reason is plain—well-instructed they've been
In the lyre of that have beyond!

The sorrow which fills o'er our pathway in life,
At times is a burden severe;
The crosses and trials, the anguish and strife,
Cause many a heart-ache and tear.
But faith in the Giver of all that is good,
Has promised God's children most fond,
That a crown of eternal glory awaits
All those in that haven beyond.

PLEETING FAME.

I have often thought and so often said,
How, to remember, we have school the same,
How foolish were those who have strives and bled,
To gleam from frail Glory a breath-fleeting fame.

I have heard word-sons stories of those who have spoke
Unsuge to their end and the tomb,
Though they by unbridled ambition were led,
Still their names now are shrouded in gloom.

Yet others off lured by the mirage of fame,
Have thoughtlessly followed the gaze,
And dreamt that a hair-liminded their name
With unfulfilled transhcent eyes.

How many have even, how many now follow
Fame's unpitiful smile and false speech;
How many now tread in her footstepe most hollow
And fast to the tales she's accustomed to teach.

And their names! Do they shine with the light of renown?
Do they dazzle the vision of men?
Do they at mere mention come lightly to bound,
Hearts both in the village, the city, the glen?

Ah, no! not even a single soul can say,—
Any alone had been dear
Their works are unknown as the clay
That wraps their body, death and fame.

Then let it be our ambition thought
To seek for fame that will not die;
May our days fly on, with goodness fraught,
Which deeds to be remembered by.

With deeds that shall outlive the world;
That shall embalm every name
Where glory's banner is unfurled
In the temple of Eternal Fame.

OF ALL THE POETS TO ROVE AWHILE.

Of all the poets to rove awhile,
There are none so blithe and gay,
As those around old Idale Creek
At close of Summer's day.

Ah! there you'll find dear joys untold,
Fresh springing everywhere—
Along the rugged sun-kissed hills,
And in the fragrant air.

You'll hear the streams singling down,
Complaining as they flow,
And glistening 'mong the crowns, 'ill
They join the bay below.

But, oh! to fill your cup of joy,
There bells you'll hear show by—
SS. Mary's, Joseph's and St. Paul's,
Beneath the raptured sky—

Availing to their magic way,
The Angelus sweet and mild,
Until you are in reverie
Made gentle as a child.

Ah, yes! the evenings glide like this—
And even more lovely too,
For jingling bells you would fall to point
The tenth of any view—

That gleam beneath the fading hours
In dewy, melting light,
Until the eastern star and moon
Are seen in glory bright.

"VALISKA"

A Catholic Story of Temptation, and Triumph over Evil.

[WRITTEN FOR THE MONITOR BY "SEFTON."]

CHAPTER II.

At last towards the end of the week, the new neighbors moved in. Valiska could hardly tear herself away from her mother's side and see them as they stepped in and out of the house, arranging their scanty furniture, for she could see that they were poor by the rude furniture and coarse home-made curtains, which covered the windows; but after they were settled there was such a look of peace and contentment about the place, and in the plain, almost homely, face, of its young Irish mistress, as she bustled about her work or sang to her baby girl and taught her little by his prayers, or told him wonderful stories of the land of their birth—for they were not long from the "Emerald Isle."

Valiska would often stand on the back steps and listen to the soft voice, telling little Michael of the miracles of Knock and Lourdes, and how he must be a true son of his Blessed Mother Mary.

Then for a moment a great sorrow would overcome Valiska, and she would turn away with tearful eye, but pride would come to undo the sweetness of that one moment of contrition. "What would Gratalia think if she were to see me crying over a few words said by that women next door?" Then she would wipe away the tears, and resume her work.

The new neighbors were there some few weeks, when an accident happened which brought Valiska to their cot. Her uncle had a large water dog which he kept chained in the yard. Little Michael Malone, who used to roam about the hills, back of the house, had been out gathering flowers, chanced to see one near the fence, stopped to pluck it, not perceiving the dog, which, with a low growl, jumped the fence and would have injured the child, were it not for Valiska, who saw the dog springing over the fence and heard Michael scream.

She rushed to the rescue, called Carlo away, and picking up the terrified child, carried him to his mother.

For Mrs. Malone was much frightened at first; but Valiska calmed her fears, telling her she had called the dog away before any harm had been done.

"Why the Lord be good to you, Miss," said the grateful mother. "Sure it would be a hard blow to us, if harm came to our Michael."

Mike got over his fright, and was praying the Lord to bless the pretty lady that saved him from the fangs of the big dog.

"But, mother," and he, turning to her, "do you think the Holy Mother will listen to me and bless Valiska when I tell the altar I was going, when the beast took after me, and niver a one have I brought to put a bit her feet, in my flight?"

"Oh, yes, darlin', she'll listen to you, and when the dog is chained, you may go and gather as you know."

"Then," said he to Valiska, "I would you to him now, so I can get the flowers afore night. Niver a day passes without I bring a few posies to my Blessed Mother. I don't think I could sleep easy if I let that duty pass."

"Very well, dear," said Valiska, "I will go now and chain him, and we will never trouble you again; good-bye, little Mike, will you not come and see me?"

"Yes Miss, with pleasure, if my mother will give me leave."

Mrs. Malone assured Mike that he might go to see the young lady when he wished, and, ere long, Mike was a daily caller at Valiska's home. One day Gratalia came in while he was there, and looking at him patronizingly, said:

"So this is the little Irish boy that lives next door? Before Valiska could reply, Mike answered, saying:

"Yes, ma'am, I am the little Irish boy that lives next door."

"What a pert little fellow you are," said the girl, "" what is your name?"

"My name is Mike Malone, but its not pert I am. My mother teaches me to be polite and decent to every one," and eyeing Gratalia searchingly, he took up his hat and went home.

The next day he came as usual to see Valiska. "What do you think of my friend, Mike?" she asked, "is she not lovely?"

"Its one way, yes, in another, no," replied Mike. "She has a bad eye in her head."

"Why, Mike, why do you dislike her, she is my dearest friend."

"I think 'twould be better if you never saw her," was his straightforward answer.

"No, no, you misjudge her, Mike," said Valiska, as seriously as if she were talking to an old man, instead of a boy of ten. "She would not do wrong, nor lead any one else to do it."

"I hope I'm not misjudging her, but I have no use for any one that'll mistrain say livin' thing, let alone a poor old woman as I saw pure pretty friend the other day gittin' a pile of impitinence to a poor old cr'ypther that's livin' with her over there, and all because her white fe'ce wasn't inclined to suit her highness, so you must know that such doin's is not the work of a Christian or a lady."

"Even enough, but maybe she was angry at something else, and did not mean it."

"If she didn't mean it, why did she do it, sure when I do a thing I mean it. If you do anything an' don't mean it, it's a lie poor actin'. Maybe you think she didn't mean what she told me the other day, that I was a pert boy. To think of her giving me such a character. Oh, then 'twas all I could do to hold my temper an' treat her with the contempt she deserved. Miss Valiska, if you value your peace of mind, your character and all you have, love her alone afore it's too late."

"Why, child, how could you ask me to give up my friend. That would be wrong. Why do you talk so of her, you do not know her."

"Throw for you, but my father known of her, an' I feel it in my bones you'll wish you had taken Mike Malone's adv ce, an let her drop afore many weeks have gone bygone! mark back. But good bye, now, I must be goin' home, here she comes, an' I want no talk with her at all, but lock out for her, that's all I say to you!"

Just as Michael went out, Gratalia came in, flushed and excited, full of a new project.

"Oh, Valiska," she cried, as she embraced her. "I have such a glorious secret to let you into—but promise me first you will do what I ask!"

"Tell me, first."

"No, no promise, promise. I'm burning out of the way, come there's a darling, say you will," coaxed Gratalia, as she put her arms round Valiska's neck, and looking at her tenderly, kissed her lips.

Oh! fatal fascination! Lured by Gratalia's superior loveliness and caressing ways, Valiska was forced to yield.

"Yes," she said, returning the caress, "now tell me what it is?"

"Will you promise to follow me, to do what I tell you?"

"Yes, yes," answered Valiska, excitedly, "tell me, quick."

"Well, listen. In T——, there is to be a great masquerade next week. I wish to attend and my mother objects, now I am going, any way, and I want you to come along, will you come?"

"Here is a long way to T——. We cannot think of it. We would have to start the day before and travel all night, and my uncle is not here, and—"

"Bah! as one go and return before he comes, and no one will be the wiser. My brother will go with us. We will be all right, and then you know he will buy us a dress, and we will be as well as the next one and will have a good time, and no one will know us."

"Instead of that," said Valiska, "I want I would not care who recognize me."

"Very well, then, we will have to hurry to get ready by to-morrow night. After dark we will start, for I don't wish my one to see us, as my mother will make a fuss—she is so tiresome."

"Tomorrow night" echoed Valiska, "I thought you said it was to take place next week?"

"Yes, yes, you poor, innocent, little goose, but don't we want to be there some time ahead to secure tickets and get ready; I have a relative there we can stay with, and we will start back after the party, the same night."

A feeling of dread overcame Valiska. Something was not just as Irish old he, she thought. How she wished she had been alone to promise, but now that it was done she could not draw back. Poor Valiska, your pride and self will, your inordinate love of beauty, your neglect of God's Holy Commandments, have brought you to this. Michael prophesied. For Valiska had forgotten God since she went with Gratalia, who controlled her every action. When Gratalia went to Mass, then only Valiska went, and the result was she missed it frequently.

Often a desire to go and throw herself at the feet of the Saviour once more, and beg for peace and pardon, would come to her, but a word of Gratalia based of "it is so we would laugh at such 'old English' ideas," so she stifled her longings and went on—on the road paved with Gratalia, her evil genius luring her on.

So when she made up her mind to take this unknown trip, she grew reckless, and even though the sorrow and anxiety caused such an act disguised her at times, and filled her with loathing, still, the Tempter began to lay his cold hand on her soul, and visions of the wonderful things she would see. She had never been outside of the village of "——."

The next evening came, and Valiska put out the lights and closed the blinds earlier than usual, to deceive Mrs Malone into the belief that she had retired early. Then she sat in the dark until the clock struck ten, but still no signs of Gratalia; she began to get uneasy. The deathly stillness of the place frightened her, and when she heard the roll of wheels in the distance, she felt somewhat relieved for she knew her friends were coming. Her friends! Oh, disgraceful, stubborn girl! She was soon to find that they were her worst enemies.

Very slowly the buggy came up so that it would not waken the neighbors. As it stopped, Valiska stepped out, locked the door, and putting the key into her pocket, went to her fate. She noticed that the vehicle was a one-seated affair, and wondered why they did not get a larger one anyway for three. Gratalia and her brother helped her in without a word and soon they were rolling away from home; Valiska was ill at ease, a strange foreboding of evil came over her which she could not account for. She tried to dispel it, but in vain; Gratalia saw that she was quiet and distressed, and did all she could to raise her spirits in which she partly succeeded. In this way they went on until they were some five miles from the village, when Valiska heard the approach of another vehicle, and was not a little surprised when Hey Vallenda (Gratalia's brother), stopped his team to await the stranger, who reined up his horses side of their buggy, and after a few hurried words with Hey, assisted Gratalia into his buggy and drove rapidly ahead, leaving poor Valiska alone with Hey to follow. He arranged the buggy robes for Valiska's comfort, and prepared to overtake his sister.

"What does this mean?" murmured Valiska, white to the lips, "Gratalia has deceived me, or I—"

"You will find out soon enough," returned Hey, as he lashed his horses into a rapid pace, and was soon trotting alongside of the other team.

For some time the two buggies rolled along in silence. Valiska was too horrified to speak. She realized it all in one bitter moment of crowding anguish. She had probably lost her name as well as her friends!

"Oh!" she moaned to herself, "why did I not listen to Sorella. She knew better than I."
